ALLEN'S INDIAN MAIL.

MONDAY, JULY 30, 1883.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

OUR advices by the overland mail are, from Bombay, July 3; Madras and Allahabad, July 2; Calcutta, June 30.

THE Daily Telegraph announces this morning that arrangements have been completed under which, for the future, the Indian mails will come home via Marseilles instead of Brindisi.

THE feelings of disgust and well nigh of despair, which Lord Ripon's policy has excited in the minds of all thoughtful Indian officials, are well expressed in a letter which the Pioneer publishes, from a gentleman whom our contemporary describes as an officer of a long and distinguished career, and a Liberal in politics. The Pioneer says:—

"We have alluded more than once to the feelings of old and experienced officials with regard to the course that is being pursued by the present Government, and we have therefore some little satisfaction in quoting the opinion of an officer of large experience in the Civil Service, who, in communicating to a friend his resolve not to return to India, but to retire from the service, writes:—'Uneventful and even monotonous and dull though life be, I cannot say I feel any desire to return to harness in India; nor do I at present see much prospect of a renewal of the desire. I feel as if my heart were not drawn to life and work in India under such rapidly altering conditions, and the policy and spirit of the present Government of India. I am personally, and always have been, in favour of encouraging the growth of local self-government; but I believe in slow and quiet progress, and I abhor the big sounding phrases in which the present Government have trumpeted forth their ideas, and their policy of attempting revolutionary changes by great leaps. They will, if they have not already done so, evoke a spirit they cannot lay or satisfy except by the withdrawal entirely of the British power. I think, too, the time may come when it will occasionally be necessary to give a Native magistrate power to try a European; but there is no need yet for such a measure, and until the necessity has actually arisen, I think no change in the law should have been proposed.'"

THIS distinguished officer goes on to speak of "the party spirit and recklessness" displayed by Lord Ripon in forcing on revolutionary measures, which, he frankly confesses, "quite frighten me." So he does what a good many more would like to do under the existing miserable circumstances—retires from India for good.

A MEETING of the East India Association will be held to-day in the Council Room, Exeter Hall, at 2 p.m., when a paper will be read by D. S. White, Esq., (President Eurasian and Anglo-Indian Association of Southern India,) on "The Eurasian and Anglo-Indian Association of India." The Right Hon. Lord Stanley of Alderley will preside. Discussion is invited.

IT will be seen from an article we quote in another column, that the Statesman—the only thorough-going supporter of Lord Ripon's policy in the English Press of India—takes exactly the same view of the recent deplorable outrages on English women in Calcutta, as that taken by Sir Alexander Arbuthnot, and set forth in our leading columns to-day; namely, that they "are—at least sometimes—the fruit of the present agitation." The Indian Mirror, however, the leading Native daily, appears to endeavour to fix on those who hold this view very much the same idiotic opinions as those attributed by Lord Kimberley to Sir Alexander Arbuthnot. The Statesman thus complains of the misinterpretation:—

"The Indian Mirror, in an article on the stories that are current about Natives insulting Europeans, says:—'We are sorry to see that the Statesman has begun to lend its ear to such stories.' The Mirror is, perhaps, not aware that it is the duty of a conscientious journalist to lend his ear to all credible facts of public interest, whether they support or conflict with his own opinion. It is impossible to ignore the fact that such stories are afloat, and in referring to them, we simply gave the best authenticated ones that had been reported to us.' And in commenting on them we said:—'Our own opinion is that incidents of the kind specified by the writers we have quoted, have been common enough at all times, but that there is at present a preternatural sensitiveness and suspicion abroad which magnifies and multiplies them, and gives them a graver significance than rightly belongs to them. It seems to us to be entirely absurd, for instance, to assume a connection between the rape case or the cases of criminal trespass at Howrah and the present hostility which has, unfortunately, arisen between Europeans and Natives. But we do not think it improbable that the cases of rudeness and insult in the street are—at least, sometimes—the fruit of the present agitation.'"

IT is fair to notice that the Indian Daily News doubts whether the horrible case of rape, which is by far the most serious of all those hitherto reported, can be confidently regarded as a consequence of the present situation. Of course it cannot; no one isolated case can be so regarded; but when we get a whole flight of somewhat similar cases, and of well-authenticated cases of insult offered to Europeans and Eurasians in the streets—such as are detailed in our "Mail News" column to-day—it seems to us the very height of wilful political blindness to refuse to see in the phenomenon a remarkable and most alarming "sign of the times."

THE Statesman, as the organ of Lord Ripon's Government, announces that the opinions received from the Local Administrations and officers are to be "collated" and published. Why "collated?"—and what is Lord Ripon's idea of "collation?" We have never been of those who held Lord Ripon personally responsible for the gross manifestation of bad faith on the part of the Government in the matter of the famous "garbled telegram;" but we have no hesitation in saying that that deplorable incident renders it, if possible, more than ever strictly imperative that the Government should exercise the most rigid and scrupulous care, in publishing "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth," when the eagerly-looked for local opinions are put before the public.

THE Englishman says:—

"The name of the gentleman concerned in the authorship of Reuter's telegram on the debate of the March 9 is now so generally known that we do not think we are justified in any longer withholding from it that additional publicity which may attach to its announcement in a public journal. We may state at once then that the telegram was compiled by Mr. Primrose, Private Secretary to His Excellency the Viceroy, from notes made during the course of the debate by a gentleman whose name, as he took no responsible part in framing the composition founded upon them, it is unnecessary here to mention. It will of course be understood that Mr. Primrose's responsibility in this transaction is limited to the authorship. The Government of India is responsible for having accepted his composition as an adequate account of the debate, for having sent it as such through Reuter's Agency to the English papers, and for having paid for it from the public funds."

To this, the Pioneer adds:—

"The circumstance of its transmission was only known to some half-dozen people the Viceroy included."

THE Calcutta correspondent of the Times gives a hint to-day of a probable development, in the near future, of those Native powers of political agitation which Lord Ripon has fostered, in the direction of a movement on the part of the agitators against the Bengal Zemindars and the Native aristocracy generally. When this Ilbert Bill agitation was first set a-going by Lord Ripon, we clearly intimated our opinion that the spirit of unrest thereby aroused would not be contented with merely attacking the English; it would soon spread, we then prophesied, and set class against class in India among the Natives themselves, as similar causes have done in Ireland.

WE trust the cause of the Bengal Zemindars will be actively taken up by Anglo-Indians of experience in England. In India their moderation and their natural and laudable desire to evince a loyal spirit towards the rulers of the land have led them into a difficult position. In fairness to them it must be remembered that the English raj at present is "a house divided against itself;" when we have the Viceroy and two Members of Council on one side, and all other Englishmen on the other, it is very difficult for a loyal Native nobleman or gentleman promptly to answer the question "Under which King?"

THE best thing that could happen to the Zemindars—as to most other people who have any stake in India—would be that change of Viceroy, which seems to be foreshadowed by the report, telegraphed from Simla, that the Secretary of State has wired to Lord Ripon urging a reduction of expenditure. This must have been done immediately after the debate on Mr. Onslow's amendment—when, by his success in defeating Mr. Onslow, Mr. Gladstone has finally fixed on the revenues of India the Egyptian war-charges. If the telegram ordering a reduction of expenditure under these circumstances does not bring about Lord Ripon's retirement, nothing will.

In accordance with instructions to that effect received at Chatham, the 2nd Battery of the 1st Brigade (Scottish Division) Royal Artillery, has been medically inspected, as the non-commissioned officers and men are intended to be employed as a mountain battery in India, and none but men thoroughly fit for the service will be attached to the battery. According to the latest orders received at Chatham, the battery will embark for India at the commencement of the ensuing trooping season, and will take over the mountain equipment now in charge of the 8th Battery, 1st Brigade, Eastern Division. The numbers selected to be attached to the mountain battery are six non-commissioned officers, one bombardier, one trumpeter, and fifty-two gunners, including acting bombardiers. The battery will be officially inspected by Major General the Hon. R. Monck.

THE Englishman gives the following report on the Calcutta Freight Market for the week ending June 30:—

"There has been very little business transacted during the past week, rates showing a slight tendency downwards. Two sailing vessels have fixed for London, two have been chartered for Mauritius, and one small vessel obtained a charter for the West Indies. Our unfixed tonnage has increased to 24,814 tons. For London via Suez Canal.—The market opened very quiet, and little or no business could be done until the steamers gave way 2s. 6d. per ton, when the Olan Liners MacKenzie and MacArthur fixed, engaging a large quantity of wheat at 35s., linseed at 37s. 6d., jute and rapeseed at 40s. At which rate the market may be said to close steady. For Liverpool via Suez Canal.—Nothing has been done. For U. K. or Continent via Suez Canal.—No demand. For Mediterranean ports. The Comorin s.s., whose previous charter had been cancelled, went on the loading berth with dead weight at 27s. 6d. for Marseilles, filling up at Pondicherry with the balance of her cargo. For London via Cape.—The Baron Aberdare and County of Selkirk have taken the berth with saltpetre at 37s. 6d., wheat at 40s., and linseed at 41s. 3d. For Liverpool via Cape.—Nothing done. For Dundee via Cape.—Nothing done. For U. K. or Continent via Cape.—Nothing done. For New York.—Nothing done. For Mauritius.—The Ben Macdui and Pembroke Castle were chartered for a full cargo of grain at Rs. 1-2 per bag, and light freight at Rs. 9 per ton. Our unfixed tonnage stands at 24,814 tons."

We take the following on Indigo crop prospects from Messrs. William Morant and Co.'s Market Report:—

"The rains set in generally over Behar about 17th instant, and favourably so far as Chuprah, Champaran, and the northern part of Tirhoot are concerned, but on the Mozufferpore side the rainfall was exceptionally heavy, some factories having gauged from 17 to 25 in. in about sixty hours. This heavy fall destroyed several hundred Biggahs of plant, and seriously injured a good deal more. The weather since then has been generally favourable over Behar, and most factories have now either commenced or are just about commencing Mahai; so far the only returns we have seen are from Champaran, and there the yield is fair. In Lower Bengal generally there is no improvement to report. The season is a late one in most districts and prospects are indifferent; such factories as are at work are getting but poor produce. In Benares and the Doab the rainfall hitherto has been light, and we hear of complaints of drought. On the whole, however, we consider that prospects in these parts are good."

AND the same authority says on the Calcutta Tea Market for the same period:—

"On Thursday last, the 28th instant, there was considerably less demand for tea, except for a few specially fine lots. Cachar and Kumaon teas were not in much request, and were difficult to move. We quote a fall on fine and finest of two annas per pound, and on common and medium qualities of fully one anna. The next sales will be held on the 5th proximo."

"Mr. T. A. M. Gennoe, deputy opium agent, Fyzabad, Oudh."

TELEGRAPHIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE following is the usual weekly telegram from the Times correspondent, dated Calcutta, July 29:—

"An influential meeting of Zemindars of Behar was held at Mozufferpore on the 22d inst. for the purpose of considering the Rent Bill. The following resolutions were passed:—

"First, that though the primary object of the Bill is to give further facilities for the collection of rents, it is so drafted as to give practically no further facilities, and by abolishing the present system of distraint it makes the position of the Zemindars very much worse; secondly, that the sudden and wholesale extension of occupancy rights must necessarily disturb the present friendly relations, and that the Zemindars are entitled to compensation for the vast quantity of land which it is proposed to give away to the ryots by a stroke of the pen; thirdly, that instead of having a costly survey it would be better to make leases compulsory, which can only be done by abolishing the prohibitive duties on registration; fourthly, that a memorial be submitted to Government."

"A committee was then appointed to raise funds and prepare a memorial."

"There can be no doubt that the Rent Bill has produced a feeling of consternation among the Zemindars. Hitherto the ryots have shown no excitement, but it is impossible to say how long this may continue, and it is by no means unlikely that the other measures of the Government may have the effect of arousing a very dangerous spirit among the tenant class. There exists in Calcutta a society called the Indian Association, the main object of which is political agitation, and which has taken a leading part in stirring up native feeling on the subjects of the Criminal Jurisdiction Bill and the Contempt of Court case. The association, consisting for the most part of middle class professional men, has no sympathy with the Zemindars, and has openly expressed approval of the Rent Bill. Thus far, however, it has not attempted to agitate in favour of that measure, nor is the reason far to seek. The district officers would not, and could not have countenanced such an agitation, and while the district officers continue to be, as he always heretofore has been, the visible and present manifestation to the people of his district of the distant and mysterious power of Government, an agitation discountenanced by him would have no chance of success. Now, however, it seems to be the policy of Government to diminish the prestige and minimise the power of the district officers. The local self-government scheme treats them as of little account."

"The Lieutenant Governor of Bengal and his officers have been positively vilified by the native Press and by native political orators, for no other reason than because they expressed disapproval of the Criminal Jurisdiction Bill. It is now commonly believed that the opinions of those officers on that measure are to be deliberately disregarded, because they happen to differ from the theory which commends itself to the Supreme Government. When this becomes known throughout Bengal—and the vernacular papers are doing their best to make it known—it cannot but create a conviction in the minds of the peasantry that Government has allied itself with them against the local officers. The prestige and power for good of these latter will disappear; a fruitful field will be open for agitators; and recent experience has shown that there will be no want of labourers to till it; nor is it unlikely that their efforts will be speedily followed by a general refusal to pay rent and by agrarian disturbances which can only be put down by force."

"The Calcutta Statesman, a paper which is believed to represent the views of Government on Mr. Ilbert's Bill, announces that the opinions received from the local administrations and officers are about to be collated and published. The use of the word "collate" has given rise to some speculation, and fears have been expressed that it may indicate an intention to suppress some or all of the hostile criticisms on the measure. It is hardly likely that the Government would stoop to adopt a course so disingenuous. The printing of the great mass of matter will, it is said, take sometime, but doubtless all opinions will be before the public shortly. Meanwhile the opinions of the most prominent officials are pretty well known. It is curious to note that one of these—the opinion of perhaps the staunchest supporter of the Bill confirms in a remarkable manner the contention of the opposition that it is impossible to ignore distinctions of race. Sir Charles Aitchison, while suggesting that all Europeans vested with first-class magisterial powers should be eligible for the appointment of justice of the peace, would not make Natives eligible until after a certain number of years' service as first-class magistrates, and not even then, unless they were approved by the High Court and complied with certain rules to be laid down from time to time by Government.

"An invidious and wholly unnecessary distinction which prevails in the matter of leave, rules, and pension between the Covenanted Civil Service and members of the various branches of the public service classed under the head of Uncovenanted has long been a source of discontent to the latter. It is stated that they are now about to take steps to try and obtain redress. The concessions they seek are reasonable. They are, first, that furlough and leave on medical certificate be reckoned service for pension; secondly, that proportionate pensions be fixed for service between fifteen and twenty-five years and between twenty-five and thirty years; thirdly, that retirement after thirty years' service be permitted without medical certificate; fourthly, that service before the age of twenty-two be reckoned towards pension.

"Camps for the concentration of troops for field exercises and manœuvres will be formed next winter at Meerut, Umballa, and Rawul Pindia.

"The ringleaders in the Bheel outrages which took place in Ali Rajpore State some months ago have been tried at Indore. Chittoo, who was mainly responsible, was sentenced to penal servitude for life.

"There has not yet been an open rupture with the Kohat Pass Afridis. The question has been asked them whether they intend to close the Pishin Pass against newly taxed salt; should they answer in the affirmative, their allowance will be discontinued, but no further notice will be taken, unless they commit offences on British territory.

"The Jirgah of Sheorams on the Dera-Ismail-Khan frontier have promised to make full atonement for the misbehaviour of the tribe, and the blockade lately instituted against them has been raised.

"The Ameer is now visiting Khisar, near Khushi, en route to Cabul. He will probably arrive at the capital at the end of August."

THE PROVINCIAL PRESS ON LORD RIPON'S SUPPORTERS IN ENGLAND.

(Daily Bristol Times and Mirror, July 27.)

After the lapse of five months since the provisions of Mr. Ilbert's Bill were made public, the admirers of Lord Ripon have summoned up heart to convene a meeting in London to express their approval of his Indian policy, and more especially of the measure which has met with such general condemnation from the vast majority of both the official and non-official classes connected with India. The meeting, held this week at the Memorial-hall, Farringdon-street, cannot honestly be regarded as a brilliant success even by its promoters. Without any disrespect to the estimable gentlemen who moved and seconded resolutions, the gathering cannot be described as influential or authoritative either in its quantity or its quality. Another meeting is to be held on Monday next with the same purpose in view, under the presidency of Mr. Bright, and we question whether even his venomous and prejudiced utterances will attract any further audience than that which met under the chairmanship of Sir J. Phear. Perhaps the most striking feature of the recent meeting was the entire absence of anyone representing the non-official classes in India, or of anyone connected with the people and the interests which would be affected and imperilled by the passing of Mr. Ilbert's Bill. Lord Northbrook wrote a letter stating his approval of the objects of the meeting, and an extract was read in which it said, "It seems to me to be very desirable to show that opinion is not all on one way." As far as this portion of the Anglo-Indian community—and it is a very large and a very important one—is concerned, the result of this meeting would seem to show emphatically that opinion is all one way. The officials who are, or have been, connected with India were represented by Sir John Phear, an ex-judge of the High Court at Calcutta, and a Mr. Haggard, of the Bengal Civil Service, unless indeed we are to include a gentleman who was ostentatiously announced as a nephew of the late Lord Lawrence, and who may be presumed to have been vicariously expressing the posthumous views of that eminent nobleman, his illustrious relative. A contrast with the list of names, both of present and past Indian officials, and of the great merchants and bankers, and traders whose names are so familiar to all who have any knowledge of Indian affairs and Indian society, who attended the great meeting held a few weeks ago at St.

James's-hall, to express their opposition to this Bill, and who added their names to the committee formed to effect the withdrawal of the measure, suffices at once to expose the meagre and insignificant pretensions of those who organised the proceedings of last Monday night. It is true that a few ultra-Radical M.P.'s assisted on the platform, principal among whom were Mr. Thorold Rogers, Mr. Bryce, and Sir Wilfrid Lawson; but whatever qualifications these gentlemen may possess, they certainly have no connection with, or special knowledge of, the great country whose affairs they would settle off-hand with much satisfaction to themselves.

Letters were read from a few noblemen and gentlemen expressing their cautious sympathy with Lord Ripon, but scarcely pledging themselves to whatever views the meeting might adopt; but if any of these gentlemen could have managed to have been present, they would just have lent that importance and weight to the gathering which it so sadly and so markedly lacked. Professor Max Müller, who seems to have been invited to attend because he has written some valuable books on Oriental languages, wrote that "he felt a real admiration for Lord Ripon's sober policy in the government of India. As to the so-called Ilbert Bill, he never cared much for it. He thought it might have waited until it was more strongly asked for. But to withdraw it would be, he feared, a fatal mistake." It would thus seem that Professor Max Müller does not include Mr. Ilbert's Bill under the category of the sober policy of Lord Ripon, and we feel inclined to agree with the converse view implied, that this pernicious measure is begotten of blind intoxication or lamentable insanity. The Professor's view that a measure, which is undesirable and uncalled-for in itself, should not be withdrawn when once introduced only shows, we fear, that he is not as practical a statesman as he is a good linguist, and that he is not of the opinion that the welfare of the community is of higher moment than the political reputation of the individual responsible for the obnoxious measure. The abandonment of the Suez Canal scheme may, however, teach him that statesmen of far greater repute and fame than Mr. Ilbert must sometimes acknowledge their mistakes at the cost of wounding their own self-esteem, and of suffering some discredit in the estimation of others. Another striking feature in the complexion of this meeting was the decidedly one-sided character of the political views of those who took a prominent part in it. All the members of Parliament who attended it are remarkable for their extremely Radical opinions, and for their loudly-proclaimed opposition to any policy or measures of a wide National and Imperial nature. This is all the more important to observe when it is remembered that the promoters of the meeting at St. James's Hall did not place on their committee the name of a single member of the House of Commons, in order to avoid any reproach of political partisanship; but that committee, which now numbers seven hundred, includes the names of many well-known and staunch adherents of Liberal principles, and Whigs and Tories have mutually combined to oppose a measure fraught with serious danger to the interests of the nation and the very existence of our Indian Empire. This fact by itself would tend to detract from the value of the support which the meeting at the Memorial Hall offers to Lord Ripon; and seriously discounts the importance of the criticisms of the few public men who took an active part in the proceedings.

The speeches which were delivered by Lord Ripon's supporters were chiefly remarkable for their violent abuse of the opponents of Mr. Ilbert's Bill. Sneers and taunts were heaped on the apprehensions of the Europeans and Anglo-Indians who, alike in Calcutta and in London, have strongly objected to the measure. Of arguments in its favour there were none, and in their place were substituted a series of high sounding platitudes about the progress of civilisation, the equal rights of man, and other so-called humanitarian and Liberal maxims, which only exhibited the unfitness of the speakers to deal with that or any other practical problem. Prejudice and jealousy, said the Chairman, were at the bottom of the opposition to the measure; the question was, said Sir Wilfrid Lawson, whether India was to be governed by the principle of justice or to be held by the sword. These are fair specimens of the style of oratory adopted by those who are little removed, if at all, from the "Perish India" doctrinaires. No sensible man acquainted with the facts denies that India is held and can only be held by the sword, and similarly no one who has any knowledge of India and its government contends that it is not governed by the principle of Justice. It would be an evil day for India and its native populations when an audience that could be moved by, and could give credence to, such vapid and unmeaning utterances should have any influence in the direction of their destinies. It is sincerely to be hoped that the recent blunder of the Government has taught them that in dealing with vast questions and with remote countries they should first consult and be guided by those having a paramount interest in, and the most intimate acquaintance with, the subject to be determined. The provincial reports from the various Governors and high officials on Mr. Ilbert's Bill have now reached Simla, and it is admitted that an overwhelming majority of the officers consulted have expressed opinions hostile to the Bill. On Tuesday afternoon the Liberal member for Cardiganshire presented the petitions of the European and Anglo-Indian communities of India against the Ilbert Bill, which arrived by the last mail, to the House of Commons, and these bore the signatures of 14,626 persons. In addition to these petitions, which came from Calcutta, a similar petition was presented from Madras bearing 2,500 signatures. If the Government be disposed to ignore this authoritative expression of opinion, they must receive instructions from Parliament for their conduct before the House rises for the recess.

LORD RIPON'S POLICY.

A meeting was held on Monday night at the Memorial Hall, Farringdon-street, to support Lord Ripon's policy in India. Sir John B. Phear, late judge of the High Court of Calcutta, presided, and among those present were Mr. Thorold Rogers, Mr. Bryce, and Sir Wilfrid Lawson, and a number of ex-officials from India. Several letters of apology for non-attendance were read. The Duke of Argyll wrote expressing his approval of the general principle of employing natives in judicial positions. Similar views were stated by Lord Camperdown, Sir Charles Trevelyan, Lord Lawrence, Professor Max Müller, and Mr. S. Laing, M. P.; while Lord Northbrook, writing to Mr. A. Haggard, a member of the committee, said:—"It seems to be very desirable to show that opinion is not all one way." The Chairman, in opening the proceedings, said that every consideration of sound policy and of justice required that the present immunity of Europeans before the law should cease, and that Native judges should be put on a level with their white brethren in carrying on both civil and criminal business. Mr. Thorold Rogers moved a resolution urging that a native who, by his intellectual qualities had attained to high judicial office, was entitled to exercise the same powers as an English officer holding a similar position. Mr. Robert Cust and Mr. Seymour Keay spoke in support of the resolution. The resolution was carried unanimously. Mr. Bryce moved the next resolution, to the effect that the proposed change was called for by the needs of the country, while it would form a training to enable the Indian people to take a larger share of their own government. This resolution was adopted, as was another, calling upon the Ministry to support Lord Ripon's policy. Sir Wilfrid Lawson moved the final resolution, expressing "heartly approval of the wise and just conduct of Lord Ripon and his colleagues, and appealing to the English people to join in supporting a ruler who has shown himself so loyal and true to the interests alike of England and India." There were 250,000,000 of Natives and about 60,000 Europeans; and, if any man believed that we could go on holding India simply by force, he was not worth a moment's argument. The resolution was carried unanimously.

LORD KIMBERLEY AT COOPER'S-HILL.

The Secretary of State for India visited the Royal Indian Engineering College at Cooper's-hill on Saturday, and distributed the prizes awarded to the successful students. The visitors included Lord Napier of Magdala, Sir William Muir, Sir R. Temple, Sir Henry Norman, Sir Barrow Ellis, Sir Ashley Eden, Sir E. Clive Bayley, General Sir R. Pollock, General Boileau, General MacLagan, Lieutenant General Dickens, Colonel Yule, Dr. Goodford (Provost of Eton), and Mr. Noble Taylor.

The President of the College, General Sir A. TAYLOR, in his report, spoke favourably of the working of the institution under its new organisation, and mentioned that the last of those students who entered under the old regulations were leaving that day. Some 360 of the students had on leaving obtained appointments in the Indian Public Works Department, and there was reason to expect soon that every second man in the Department would have come from Cooper's-hill. (Hear, hear.) The whole of the senior men who completed their course that day had qualified themselves for the public service.

The students who had gained scholarships and prizes then came up to receive the awards. Mr. S. P. H. Dyson, a third year student, who was appointed a Fellow of Cooper's-hill, took the Fellows' scholarship and several prizes. Among second year students Mr. P. H. Bower had won the Foundation scholarship in engineering in the Cooper's-hill Endowment Fund, established by the civil engineers of the Public Works Department; Mr. C. Roberts carried off the Argyll scholarship in natural science, given by the Earl of Kimberley; Mr. J. M. A. Despeissis was Chesney scholar in mathematics; and Mr. C. F. Sykes gained the President's scholarship in applied mechanics. Mr. F. Grant obtained the Foundation scholarship for a first year student.

The Earl of KIMBERLEY, who was warmly cheered on rising to speak, said that the importance of this college was strongly brought to the mind of any one who occupied the position he held, and if he had been struck by one thing more than another in the office over which he had the honour to preside, it was the immense importance of public works in that department. (Hear, hear.) He felt satisfaction from what he had heard, having taken pains to acquaint himself with the condition of the college, at the progress it had made. He had not the slightest doubt that the change which had recently been made in throwing open this College would conduce immensely to its usefulness and permanence. They had seen how it was beginning to strike roots in all directions. From his late connection with the colonies he was particularly glad to see that two gentlemen who had distinguished themselves had come, one from the Mauritius and the other from Australia. (Cheers.) He hoped that example would be largely followed, and he felt quite certain that there was no part of our great Empire where the services of the civil engineer were more needed and would be more appreciated than in our colonies. (Hear, hear.) There was an endless number of works in those thriving communities open to the intelligence and industry of the civil engineer, and there was no branch of engineering in which the colonies did not require such assistance. And nothing could be more conducive to the benefit of the communities themselves, and the maintenance of that connection which we all cherished between ourselves and other parts of the Empire, than that gentlemen should find their way from the Colonies to the colleges of this country, and mixing here with our men obtain knowledge which would be most useful to them on their return to their homes. (Hear, hear.) The President had said, and most wisely, that he did not confine his view entirely to mental studies. Sympathising completely with all that they had just heard on the subject, he would, however, warn those who were proficient in gymnastics not to let these exercises take such possession of them as to lead them to neglect other pursuits. Our want on the whole of proficiency in the fine arts, as compared with our forefathers, arose very much from nearly all the best ability and energy of the country being devoted to practical works. That was a necessary consequence and tendency of the age, but we should make a mistake if we let it go too far. He should, indeed, be glad to hear that some of our civil engineers had become proficient in architecture, for though he did not make pretensions to judgment in such matters, he thought, in common with many others, that we suffered a good deal from the extreme ugliness of the erections by which we are surrounded, and by the want of architectural effect in the enormous towns continually being built. (Hear, hear.) He had been glad to hear from the distinguished chairman of the Board of Visitors (Lord Napier) that he was thoroughly satisfied with the changes which had been recently made in this institution; that its financial prospects were good; and that the number of students now nearly equalled the accommodation provided for them, so that there was every reason to suppose that this institution had taken root and was now established on a firm basis. It had given him great pleasure to be there. Everyone who from time to time had the honour to hold the position he now filled must, he was sure, always feel the very deepest interest in the success of this most admirable institution. (Cheers.)

UNITED SERVICE COLLEGE, WESTWARD HO, NORTH DEVON.

The distribution of prizes at the above school took place on Wednesday the 26th, before a company of 200 visitors. The examiner, Mr. E. E. Morris, M.A., of Lincoln College, Oxford, and Professor of English Literature in Melbourne University, read his report. He congratulated the Council on the success that was attending the school and singled out three points which especially seemed in favour of it; first, the large proportion of masters to boys; secondly, the excellent arrangements for physical training, such as the gymnasium and the bath, the number of boys that can swim long distances being quite abnormal; thirdly, the manifest determination on the part of the authorities to keep down expenses and to resist the luxurious tendencies of the age. He warned parents on foreign service of the absolute necessity in these days of competition not to neglect the early start of their sons in the race of life, and pointed to the junior school as a most valuable adjunct to the college. The Right Hon. Sir Stafford H. Northcote, Admiral Lord Alcester, and Vice-Admiral Sir W. M. Dowell, K.C.B., have recently added their names to the list of patrons. The Civil Service Commissioners have just granted the valuable privilege of holding the preliminary army examination at the school instead of demanding the presence of the pupils in London.

PARLIAMENT AND THE INDIAN MEDICAL SERVICE. TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—The reply of Mr. Cross to Mr. Leamy's question in the House of Commons regarding the present unsatisfactory state of the Indian Medical Service, almost defies comment, and as a combination of the suppressio veri with the suggestio falsi, it must, I should hope, be unique even amongst official utterances. I put it to your military readers to say whether they have ever seen, or previously heard of, such a thing as "an unemployed lieutenant of the Indian service" doing duty with a regiment or detachment, or on service in an enemy's country, on Rs.256—the "unemployed pay" of his rank. This rate of pay is what Mr. Cross tells the House an "unemployed lieutenant of the Indian service would draw"—if (he omitted to add) such an officer ever existed. But Rs.286-10 is what an unemployed surgeon of the Indian service does draw, under the above-mentioned conditions, and he does exist. In 1880-81, thirty-five surgeons were gazetted to Bengal. Moral.—If you intend to reduce your establishment, first increase the number of your servants. The Government have admittedly more surgeons than they know what to do with; hence they steadily continue to add—in diminished numbers, it is true, but still to add—to the surplus, and they are at this moment advertising for more! What sort of men will they get, do you think? “The present difficulty,” says Mr. Cross, “is being met by a large decrease in the number of appointments.” He should have added, “and by depriving those already appointed of their just dues.” “The published conditions are being accurately fulfilled.” Was this your own opinion, Sir, when, after an impartial perusal of the “published conditions,” you penned the paragraph which appeared in your issue of June 13th, and is that the opinion so generally expressed by your contemporaries?

Finally I apprehend that Mr. Cross's answer is scarcely calculated to allay the widespread and unfortunate sense of wrong now prevailing amongst the junior surgeons of the Indian Medical Service; nor, I confidently expect, will it succeed in hoodwinking the public whose servants those junior surgeons are, grievously wronged though they be, and well-nigh ruined in mind, body, and estate.

RIGHT AGAINST MIGHT.

THE LIEUTENANT GOVERNOR OF BENGAL AND THE NATIVE PRESS.

THE Statesman publishes the following letter:—

“Sir,—Referring to your article of the 16th instant, I am desired to contradict the statement that urgent appeals had been made to the Lieutenant Governor for the prosecution of native newspapers, that the proposal was referred to the Supreme Government, and that the Viceroy refused to sanction it. In the course of the unfortunate controversy which has occupied the public mind during the last few months, the Lieutenant Governor's attention has been called on more than one occasion by different people to articles in both English and Native newspapers; no doubt, with the desire that some notice should be taken of them by Government. These criticisms were made in no official form asking sanction for the prosecution of any particular papers for any particular articles, but reflected on the general tone of hostility to Government which characterised public writings on both sides. The Lieutenant Governor has on his own judgment, equally in an unofficial way, discouraged the proposal of taking any action against the Press during a period of great political excitement. It is entirely in the power of the Local Government to sanction prosecution under Section 124A of the Penal Code. The Lieutenant Governor has made no reference whatever for the sanction of the Government of India in the matter, and therefore His Excellency the Viceroy in Council has had no opportunity of withholding his sanction. The impression which you evidently wish to convey to the public—an impression which the Native Press has not been slow to adopt—is that Bengal has been saved from a series of Press prosecutions, against the will of the Lieutenant Governor, by the intervention of the Supreme Government. Such a statement is absolutely without foundation. The Lieutenant Governor desires me to request that this letter may be published in the Statesman.—I remain, Sir, your obedient servant.

NOTICES OF BOOKS.

“AUT CÆSAR AUT NIHIL.”*—BY THE COUNTESS VON BOTHMER.

THE title of this work well conveys the importance of its contents. The high merit of the political and historical portion of the book is beyond doubt, beyond argument. It is indeed so remarkable, so faithful, and so fine a picture of Russian life that we only regret the word “novel” on the title page. It is history, history carefully drawn, thoroughly mastered, faithfully told. The information of a solid nature contained in those chapters, which must secure the book lasting and European fame, is scholarly in its patience and completeness. The idle and superficial will cast the volumes aside and declare them dull; the prejudiced will affect to despise the notion of being taught anything by one who ostensibly arrogates no more serious motive to herself than “novel writing;” but the candid reader will not only mark and learn, he will thank the author for that which she has vicariously “inwardly digested” on his behalf.

The scenes between Bianca, the heroine, and her unsympathetic aunt are delightfully natural, and the description of German and Russian scenery in every way worthy of the hand in whose touch we recognise again and again the author of “German Home Life.” Countess von Bothmer could write nothing dull. She has the gift of arresting attention, and of carrying her audience with her; but that were limited recognition, if it stood alone. There is a generous spirit of appreciation in her sketch of the beautiful Jewess, Esther Rodostamos. Helena Perowska is a nobly-drawn character, womanly, despite her faltering vengeance, to the core. Her address to the “black people” is thrilling in its impassioned eloquence. Power and enthusiasm are seldom tempered by the good sense that restrains, and it is greatly to Countess von Bothmer's credit that she abuses none of her gifts. She is grave and reticent, where gravity and reticence leave a sense of reserved force on the reader's mind. No doubt her own sense of humour helps her to avoid that fall from the sublime to the ridiculous which means failure. Some persons may be disposed to blame her extreme outspokenness. We are not, though she evidently has the courage of her convictions. Courage need not banish discretion; the better part of valour must always remain with the valiant, as discretion alone would not conquer, as Countess von Bothmer aims at doing, kindlier sympathies, wider judgments, larger liberties, and more liberal love. Such being her programme, we only follow her example in being to the “virtues very kind,” and to the “faults a little blind,” which cavillers may discover in “Aut Cæsar aut Nihil.”

CORRESPONDENCE.

A HYDERABAD NEWSPAPER AND THE INSTALLATION OF THE NAWAB OF MURSHIDABAD.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE “INDIAN MIRROR.”

SIR,—The Hazur-Daster of Hyderabad, referring to the installation of His Highness the Nawab Bahadur of Murshidabad, writes to the following effect, viz:—

“What wretch can there be who will refrain from rejoicing, and at the same time shedding tears at the installation of H.H. Nawab Bahadur of Murshidabad? Ye, impartial observers, tell us, how is it that the Raes of Murshidabad is dubbed a mere Nawab Bahadur, and the title of Nawab Nazim of Bengal relegated to the regions of oblivion to rot with the old and rejected records? This is the return now received by a Reasut that made the English Sovereign of India! Look ye that have eyes, and take warning!”

I enclose the original in Persian. The above is a translation. If there be any errors in the rendering you can have it corrected. I did not translate the details of the ceremony, &c., as useless.—Yours, &c.,

OUR ARMY IN INDIA.

TO THE EDITOR OF “ALLEN'S INDIAN MAIL.”

SIR,—In the Allahabad Pioneer Mail of the 24th ultimo, page 652, the Editor has shown that the War Office has failed to keep up our army in India to its proper strength; you, doubtless, can call to mind that just before the Mutiny, in 1857, the European regiments had been reduced. Now in the present year, when the minds of Mohammedans are agitated, the European rank and file are one-tenth below the force which is absolutely necessary; the gaps must be filled up by 6,000 soldiers from this country. So unpopular is the present service in India that the bounty of 50 Rupees fails to tempt our seasoned warriors to re-engage. In one regiment of 700 only seven have volunteered; out of two regiments a similar number, although only two years' extra service is required. India is a volcano; when an eruption takes place our few soldiers appear to be lost among tens of millions of subjects. How can we best keep up a sufficient army in India? Few patriots will recommend the buying of German mercenaries, but it is impossible to have a local army of Englishmen? The local service under the East India Company was always popular. Good and well-educated men offered themselves as recruits, a fine force of 10,000 men could be raised in six months, and those who might be allowed to marry would settle in India after their long term of service had expired.—Your obedient servant,

LORD KIMBERLEY AND THE ILBERT BILL.

TO THE EDITOR OF “ALLEN'S INDIAN MAIL.”

SIR,—I venture to offer the following remarks on the re-deputation by the Secretary of State for India of the influential deputation which addressed his lordship on the above subject, yesterday. Lord Kimberley very courteously stated that he was “sensible of the weight and importance of the deputation”—but not of its arguments. Yet, it must be evident that had his lordship carried out his own to their legitimate conclusion, the result would be, that he would give as much political weight to the Fijian “representative system”—or the Egyptian—as he would to the Indian and the Irish. Moreover, the comparison between the two latter was certainly most infelicitous, view it from whatever point we may; and it reminds us of the “insulting comparison” as it has been called, between Jamaica and Ireland, and their respective populations. Lord Kimberley seemed to forget that he was replying to those of equal mental capacity with himself, and with a real and personal knowledge of India, as opposed to his perfunctory and imperfect knowledge, because the practical experience is wanting. Theoretically, we may recognise such monstrosities as Tory, Whig, and Radical Hindoos and Mahomedans, in order to maintain the reputation of the Liberal Procrustean bed, on which the man of genius or science, equally with the savage or the half-civilised man must be stretched. But there is practically no such political equality possible, at present, in the world—and, indeed, no one knows this better than Lord Kimberley himself. As for the Viceroy of India, his plastic and amiable character is apparent (and always has been to those who have had the privilege of a visit to the green room); and much may be forgiven him, for the pomp and circumstance of his surroundings have only exposed him the more to superficial or evil counsellors, and we may well say with the Pope of yore "It much imports upon what times, even the best of men are cast."—Yours obediently, London, July 27, 1883.

THE RECENT OUTRAGES IN INDIA.

TO THE EDITOR OF "ALLEN'S INDIAN MAIL."

SIR,—The danger of placing the supreme control of the Government of India, of its vast territories and millions of inhabitants, in the hands of an officer personally unacquainted with the country was strongly exemplified in Lord Kimberley's answer to the deputation last Thursday, when his lordship could perceive no political significance in the extraordinary outrages which have recently been committed by Natives in India on the persons of Englishmen and Englishwomen. All that he could see was that ruffians existed in India as well as in other parts of the world. Had his lordship, however, been personally acquainted with the country, he could scarcely have failed to perceive that the outrages were such as rarely occurred during our rule, and only at times when a strong political feeling had been aroused among the people by ambitious men, religious fanaticism, or otherwise imposing on the credulity of the masses. The outrages reported from India are not such as ruffians generally commit from personal motives; in every instance the risk incurred has been out of proportion with the ostensible end in view; but they are strongly characteristic of fanatical and race antagonism, such as marked the period which immediately preceded the Mutiny of 1857. The evil might doubtless be arrested at present by judicious and firm management; but to ignore its significance must inevitably lead to its increase in extent and intensity, and to seriously aggravate the ultimate difficulty of suppressing it.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

J. DACOSTA.

THE DEPUTATION TO LORD KIMBERLEY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "TIMES."

SIR,—As I had no opportunity yesterday of replying to the remark which was made by Lord Kimberley in his answer to the deputation on the Ilbert Bill with reference to the course taken by me in alluding to certain outrages which have lately occurred at Calcutta, I wish to say that the Secretary of State entirely misunderstood my meaning when he assumed that I had referred to those outrages for the purpose of in any way reflecting upon "the character of the Native gentlemen who are likely to exercise jurisdiction under this Bill." Nothing could have been more remote from my intention, or from the plain meaning, as I venture to think, of the words in which I alluded to this painful subject. My argument was that the Bill, if it became law, would be a permanent cause of race antipathies, and that by the ill feeling which it would excite between the English in India and the Natives, it would have a bad political effect in impairing the respect and consideration with which Englishmen and Englishwomen, as a rule, are treated in that country; and in support of this argument I alluded to the painful incidents of which we have heard by recent mails, as indicating that the excitement and agitation which have resulted from the introduction of the Bill in question, and the bitter antagonism of race which it has unfortunately revived, had already begun to produce this effect. For, as every one who has lived in India knows, outrages by Natives of India against English gentlemen or ladies are, in ordinary times, extremely rare, and the occurrence in the metropolis of India within a very brief period, and at this time of excitement and agitation, of two such cases as those to which I drew attention, is surely a very significant fact, and one which goes far to justify the apprehensions of those who regard this Bill as a probable source of political difficulty.

And I cannot think that in drawing attention to this fact I am in any way open to the charge of imputing, even by implication, to native officials, least of all to the class of officials who, to repeat Lord Kimberley's words, "are likely to exercise jurisdiction under this bill," any sort of sympathy with outrage, or of drawing from the outrages which have occurred any inference as to the fitness or unfitness of native magistrates or judges to exercise the jurisdiction which it is proposed to confer upon them. I recognise quite as fully as the Secretary of State for India can recognise the impropriety and, indeed, the absurdity of any such imputations or inferences; and as one who, though deprecating as impolitic and uncalled for the withdrawal from Englishmen in India of the privilege of which it is now proposed to deprive them, has long been a staunch advocate of the claims of natives to advancement in the public service, I wish to disclaim in the most public manner the views which have been attributed to me in Lord Kimberley's speech.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

ALEX. J. ARBUTHNOT.

THE "ENGLISHMAN" ON THE RECENT OUTRAGES ON EUROPEANS.

WHEN Mr. Justice Norman was murdered by a Muhammadan fanatic, whilst presiding as chief justice during the Wahabi criminal appeal, the inference as to the motive for the crime was so irresistible that the conviction became at once established in the public mind that he was assassinated by a Muhammadan, because the fate of other Muhammadans depended upon his decision.

The connection between cause and effect in the recent outrage upon the wife of the Public Prosecutor in Calcutta is no less significant. It must be remembered that this crime was perpetrated whilst the prosecution of the Bengali rioters was still pending. The Public Prosecutor, in accordance with the requirements of his official duty, was engaged in pressing these charges home. At this very time, when terrorism would be considered most effectual in inducing him to mitigate the activity and zeal of his prosecution, a dastardly assault was made upon his wife by one of that class of Native servants, which, as a general rule, is of all classes the most submissive and respectful. These peculiar features of the case induce the powerful presumption that this crime was the immediate result of superior instigation.

Since then attempts have been made to terrorise Europeans by pleasing incidents of a like nature, graduating from wanton insults in the public streets, and running up an ascending scale of domestic assault and outrage. European ladies are at the present time a peculiar object of native animosity, in consequence, possibly, of the noble and patriotic manner in which they have stood forth to express their abhorrent protest against the ignominy and degradation to which it was sought to subject them. In addition to this, their natural weakness and unprotected position afford a special provocation to a certain class of ignoble persons, exceptional, we willingly admit, even in the East, but still sufficiently numerous to be criminally mischievous. It is less dangerous for this class to war with women than with men, and in consequence they are wont eagerly to avail themselves of this chivalrous privilege upon the faintest shade of a shadow of a political excuse.

"What the Italian is to the Englishman, what the Hindu is to the Italian, such is the Bengalee to other Hindus," is as true a description now, as when Macaulay wrote forty-two years ago. Now, unfortunately, and we desire before all things to testify that in this matter its action has been purely unwitting, the Government has, by the policy which it has recently initiated, afforded the very political excuse which has been so hungrily longed for. The Jurisdiction Bill is universally accepted by native opinion as an authoritative declaration by the Government of a considered and intentional policy to humiliate and degrade the whole class of Europeans in India. No wonder, therefore, if gratuitous insult and indignity are deemed to be the incense of all others, which will prove most grateful to the nostrils of the gods "who lie beside the nectar," at Simla, and apparently so utterly and obstinately heedless of the wail and moan of suffering humanity in the plains.

It matters very little if this native belief is founded upon an entire misconception, so long as it exists in fact. The like consequences will follow, and Europeans will continue to remain an object of native persecution until such time as the Government shall evidence in an unmistakable manner, by a public withdrawal of the Bill, that its policy has been entirely misapprehended. Until, however, this line of action is adopted, the natives will endeavour to gratify their own feelings of animosity, by ministering to what they believe to be the expressed wishes of Government. We know from the record of past events how powerfully at all times will the desires of the Government influence the direction of Oriental conduct in India.

"An Indian Government has only to let it be understood that it wishes a particular man to be ruined, and in twenty-four hours it will be furnished with grave charges, supported by depositions so full and circumstantial, that any person unaccustomed to Asiatic mendacity would regard them as decisive."

"Some of our readers may have seen in India a crowd of crows pecking a sick vulture to death; no bad type of what happens in that country as fortune deserts one who has been great and dreaded. In an instant all the sycophants, who have lately been ready to lie for him, to forge for him, to pander for him, to poison for him, hasten to purchase the favours of his victorious enemies by accusing him."

These pregnant words of Macaulay equally apply to a class, as to an individual. So long as the Natives continue to believe that their own wishes lie in the same plane as the Government intentions, so long shall we be continually harassed, by native persecution in some form or other.

The European mind is, however, at present fully aroused to the danger of permitting outrages of this description to spread. Should any more crimes of a like character occur, it will be necessary to call a meeting of the European residents in Calcutta, and at once proceed to appoint a committee of safety for the protection of the honour of their wives and daughters. It is to be hoped, however, now that public attention has been called in so painful a manner to the aggressive nature of the most recent form of native attempt at terrorism, that the Government will seize an early opportunity of setting at rest all future anxiety on the subject. The importance of speedy and energetic action is further evidenced by the advertisement columns of the Indian Mirror. In the subscription list for the Surrendranath Bannerjee Fund significantly appears the heading "The Uriah Bearer of Calcutta." It is not difficult to throw a logical conclusion as to whether the political agitation among bearers has been purely spontaneous, or whether it is, due to the instigation of the Bengalee sedition-mongers. But, whatever its mediate or immediate cause, it is a paramount political importance in the administration of India that by a decided policy and by a decisive action the mischief which has already been occasioned should as quickly as possible be undone by a public expression of determined Government repression. Unless this line of action be adopted, it is difficult to gauge the possible extent of political mischief which may ensue.

THE SAME SUBJECT DISCUSSED BY THE SUPPORTERS OF THE ILBERT BILL.

(From the Bombay Gazette and the Statesman.)

CERTAIN unfortunate cases that have occurred in Calcutta during the last few weeks have led the Englishman to take a most alarming view of the supposed feelings of Natives against Europeans and the injury to British prestige resulting from recent and pending political agitation. One of these cases was an assault by a native servant on the wife of the Public Prosecutor of Calcutta; and the Englishman attempts to trace a connection between the assault (committed by a mehter) and the fact that the husband of the lady assaulted was at the time engaged in prosecuting the native youths (of the superior class of Bengalis) who were connected with the High Court riot case. Again, the same paper asserts that "European ladies are at the present time a peculiar object of native animosity, in consequence, possibly, of the noble and patriotic manner in which they have stood forth to express their abhorrent protest against the ignominy and degradation to which it was sought to subject them." And this is followed by the equally wild statement that "the Jurisdiction Bill is universally accepted by native opinion as an authoritative declaration by the Government of a considered and intentional policy to humiliate and degrade the whole class of Europeans in India." At the same time, it is noticeable that there appear to have been lately more than usually frequent instances of violence by natives towards Europeans, and more frequently towards Eurasians, in Calcutta. A correspondent writes to the Statesman—a gentleman vouched for by that paper as one "very friendly to the natives of the country"—to call attention to five well-authenticated cases of molestation of Europeans or Eurasians by Natives in the streets during last week. These were two assaults on English sailors by gangs of Bengali schoolboys, a severe assault on "a gentlemanly-looking East Indian" by "a band of big schoolboys," and two instances of respectable East Indian girls being annoyed by Baboos accosting them in the street and pressing unwelcome attentions upon them. It is not stated whether misbehaviour of this kind was never before heard of in Calcutta. In an article on the subject of these and other lately reported outrages, the Statesman takes what seems to us a calm and correct view of the situation:—

"Our opinion is that incidents of the kind have been common enough at all times, but that there is at present a preternatural sensitiveness and suspicion abroad which magnifies and multiplies them, and gives them a graver significance than rightly belongs to them. . . . But we do not think it improbable that the cases of rudeness and insult in the street are—at least sometimes—the fruit of the present agitation. That a very bitter feeling has sprung up between the races is undeniable. Opinions may and do differ widely as to where the blame should be laid, but at present we speak only of the fact. We do not think that such incidents as have been mentioned, even when not exaggerated, are indicative of serious political danger, but they are undoubtedly socially mischievous, and they may become very embarrassing to the Government and local authorities."

And the Statesman gives a word of advice to the native papers to avoid exciting "the bitter race feelings that are now working mischief." While acknowledging that "it is vain to call on the native papers to be moderate and temperate, while the Englishman is permitted to foment the quarrel," at the same time the Statesman warns its native contemporaries that it is "extreme folly on their part to retaliate as they are doing." It is to be hoped that the advice of the Statesman will be followed rather than the example of the Englishman.

MAIL NEWS.

The Pioneer says:—

A Reuter's telegram announcing the withdrawal of the "Criminal Procedure Bill" has, by reason of the omission of the word "English," seriously misled many persons in India who are unacquainted with the mysteries of Parliamentary procedure. At the head-quarters of at least two Local Governments it was for a time believed that the obnoxious Ilbert Bill had been withdrawn, and there was a general feeling of relief alike on the Nilgiris and the Himalayas at the prospect of a most embittered controversy being brought to a close; but then came explanations in the newspapers, and the old irritation and anxiety were again revived. Some comfort may, perhaps, be found in the reflection, that the comments of the English papers upon the recent meeting at St. James's Hall are generally favourable to the views expressed by the opponents of the Indian Bill. Many native gentlemen who read the English newspapers were also deceived by Reuter's statement. We hear of one young Bengali who in his excitement exclaimed:—"It cannot be! And if it is, why—Lord Ripon has brought us to the fountain head, and now we shall drink in spite of him." Pressed to give an explanation of his meaning, the Babu stammered out that no resort to physical force was implied: merely moral pressure would be used. The Bengalis, he said, would emigrate in a body from India, and would only return when the present just demand for equality of race had been granted. He had, apparently, no doubt they would be entreated by Government to return—for how could India exist without them?

The Punjab Government have under consideration the draft of a Tenancy Bill for that province.

It is understood that the Government of India are reconsidering the whole scheme for the competitive examination of clerks in its Public Offices.

The cost of the despatch of the Indian troops to Egypt, during the late operations, there is officially estimated by the Bombay authorities thirty-three and half lakhs. This is exclusive of freightage and other incidental charges for transport.

On the conclusion of the Opium Commission the Honourable H. J. Reynolds will go to Simla in connection with the Bengal Rent Bill.

Colonel C. E. Stewart, the officer deputed by the Government to watch affairs on the Russo-Persian frontier, has reached Teheran and makes for Meshed.

The united district of Quetta-Peshin is now formally constituted by the appointment of Mr. H. S. Barnes, C.S., to Old Bazaar, its political headquarters in the Peshin Valley.

It has been arranged that field manoeuvres on a small scale shall take place in December and January next at Umballa, Meeran Meer, and Rawalpindi.

The Honourable H. S. Cunningham, of the Calcutta High Court, leaves Bombay for Europe by this mail.

The Government of India have decided to offer for sale 2,000 chests of Patna opium and 2,450 chests of Benares opium in each month from January to March, 1884, both months inclusive. They will also offer for sale 1,800 chests of Patna opium and 2,000 chests of Benares opium from April to December, 1884, both months inclusive.

An election of Municipal Commissioners at Gauhati in Assam has taken place with, the Chief Commissioner thinks, satisfactory results.

Two squadrons of the 10th Bengal Lancers proceed next autumn to Thull-Chotiali, Biluchistan. A third squadron for service in the Quetta Command will be contributed by the Punjab Frontier Force.

In many parts of Bengal the rainfall so far has been abnormally heavy; and a cyclone is reported from the head of the Bay. Chittagong has received about 50 inches, being 25 above the normal quantity: Patna and Gya recorded 13 and 14 inches respectively, instead of their usual three: Darjeeling registered on the 22nd ultimo nearly 34 inches, the normal fall for the first three weeks in June being 16 inches.

It is believed that the peace which the Ameer has patched up with the Shinwarries is not of an enduring character, and the recent looting by hillmen of a convoy of ammunition sent as a present from the Government of India to Abdul Rahman tends to confirm this belief.

The condition of affairs at Herat is said to be unsatisfactory, and the Ameer's presence in that quarter is urgently required to restore order.

One member of the Viceroy's bodyguard has been committed for trial, on a charge of being concerned in the recent savage attack on the bazaar people at Dehra Doon. The other prisoners were discharged.

The native inhabitants of Dehra Doon are reported to be dissatisfied with the result of the case, and they intend presenting a petition to Government on the subject.

The Queen has been pleased to appoint Sir Auckland Colvin, K.C.M.G., of the Bengal Civil Service, to be an Ordinary Member of the Council of the Governor General of India, in succession to Major Evelyn Baring, C.S.I., C.I.E., R.E.

INDIA IN PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY, JULY 27.

The first part of the morning sitting was occupied by a discussion on Indian finances, adjourned from May 8, when Mr. ONSLOW moved, as an addition to Mr. STANHOPE's motion, calling for a reduction of Indian expenditure, "That the House regrets the decision of the Government to cast a further burden on the revenues of India in order to meet the extraordinary charges incurred by the Indian Government on account of the expedition to Egypt."

Sir G. CAMPBELL supported the amendment, urging that the financial straits of India and the poverty of the people forbade the imposition of any additional burden.

Mr. Alderman FOWLER, on the same side, admitted that India had gained greatly by our rule, but saw no justification for throwing this charge on her.

Mr. W. FOWLER also contended that, as the Indian Government had not been consulted, and the Indian people were entirely unrepresented, and as the connection between the Indian Government and the Canal was of the vaguest character, the Home Government had acted most unjustifiably in making India contribute to the cost of the war.

Mr. CROSS, on the other hand, maintained that the Egyptian war was undertaken to secure to India the benefit of a short water communication with Europe, and that India was more interested in the Canal than England or any other part of the world. It saved at least 2s. per quarter in the freight of Indian wheat to this country, which all went to the Indian producer. The Indian Government also saved £138,000 a year in the transport of troops to and from India, and the time saved—seventeen days each way—was equal to an addition to the Army of 1,000 men, or £100,000. In addition he pointed out the advantage to India of having the markets of Southern Europe, opened to which the trade had increased 147 per cent. He denied altogether that India was in financial straits. On the contrary, there had been a reduction of three millions of taxation, four millions and a half had been saved for a famine insurance fund, and after paying the expenses of this expedition there was a surplus of £224,000. Moreover, the taxes on British India amounted this year to only 14½ annas per head. Next year, he said, it was intended to move for a Select Committee to inquire into that portion of the report of the Famine Commission relating to the construction of railways in India.

Mr. BLAKE supported the amendment, and, after some observations from Mr. ARNOLD,

Mr. GLADSTONE remarked that the motion in its form amounted to a vote of censure, as the use of the word "regret" amounted to a notice to quit. Replying to the objections to the course taken by the Government, he said it was not possible to consult the Indian Government—indeed, it would have been absurd—and so far from the Indian Government opposing—though they had complained of the original proposal—they concurred in the final arrangement which had been made. Unless the doctrine was to be laid down that all the expenses of a war beyond the frontier of India were to be paid by the people of this country, the present arrangement that one-seventh of the expenditure should be charged on the Indian Exchequer was fair and equitable. As to the argument derived from the poverty of the people, that must be carried much further if admitted at all, and the real question was whether it was for the interest of India that she should be attached to this country, and whether we governed her for her own benefit. Enlarging on the argument of Mr. CROSS, he maintained that in addition to the commercial advantages of the canal, India was interested in being brought into closer relations with the civilisation of the world, and on the commercial point he gave some additional statistics showing that while only 8 per cent. of our imports and 9½ per cent. of our exports passed through the canal, 75 per cent. of the imports of India and 39 per cent. of her exports passed by that route.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT, who supported the amendment, remarked that even if it were a vote of censure, the Government which had borne three defeats recently with remarkable equanimity would not be affected, and had probably resorted to the threat to save themselves from defeat.

Sir W. LAWSON complained of the PRIME MINISTER's attempt to turn the amendment into a party question, but protested that he would not be deterred from giving it a strong support. He repeated his condemnation of the Egyptian war, reproached Mr. Fawcett and other occupants of the Treasury Bench with changing their views on this point when they became "Government men," and wound up a lively speech by quoting from Mr. Gladstone's speech on the Afghan war—which he said was not so strong a case as this—that those who made wars should pay for them.

Mr. MACFARLANE spoke against the amendment, after which it was negatived by 210 to 55, and Mr. Stanhope's resolution was agreed to.

THE DIABOLICAL OUTRAGES ON ENGLISH WOMEN IN CALCUTTA AND HOWRAH.

Most of our readers who have correspondents in Calcutta have probably received accounts, by the last mail, of certain deplorable incidents, that seem to have stirred the heart of the English community in that city to a depth untouched since the dark days of the Mutiny. A brief paragraph in the homeward papers brought by that mail stated the bare fact that an outrage had taken place; but no details were given—and, indeed, it appears that the police investigation into the horrible circumstances of the case was being conducted in camera at the time when the mail left. But those circumstances were already well known in Calcutta Society. They had caused a thrill of horror unparalleled since the Mutiny. It cannot be doubted that we shall hear much more about this shocking business, for the private letters by the mail are full of it. We have ourselves seen two such accounts from entirely independent sources, written by persons of social position, who cannot possibly be suspected of any desire to transmit sensational intelligence; and we have heard of several other letters to the same effect. Rumours were flying about in Calcutta of other outrages, similar to those of which the details are known—which seem to be three in number, including the one of specially dramatic horror that was being inquired into when the mail left; but it is stated that the shame of publicity had caused more than one case to be hushed up. We shall publish the details of the most dreadful case as they have reached us—so far as they are fit for publication—as soon as the results of the private police inquiry are known.

It seems to be universally believed in Calcutta that the occurrence of these outrages, unprecedented since the Mutiny, is a significant indication of the temper of the times in India. It is everywhere asked—"What is it that has rendered such atrocities unknown, undreamt of, among the Englishwomen of India, for the last twenty-five years? It has not been the absence of crime of this kind; for, unhappily, in India, as in England and elsewhere, such crimes are not very rare. It has not been the lack of opportunities; for multitudes of Englishwomen have been living, respected and secure, almost alone among the Natives. It has been simply the prestige of the English name—and that prestige has been destroyed by Lord Ripon."

Now, whether the view we have just indicated be a true or a mistaken one—and we believe it to be entirely justified by facts and experience—it is absolutely impossible to doubt that it is generally, perhaps universally, held in Calcutta; and it is equally impossible to question the depth and the reality of the excitement on the subject current there. Such being the case, the deputation that waited on Lord Kimberley on Thursday last, to protest against this iniquitous Bill, would clearly have been wanting in its duty, alike to the Government and to the public, if it had not warned the Secretary of State on the point. In reply to this warning—which was clearly and quietly given by Sir Alexander Arbuthnot—Lord Kimberley is reported to have spoken as follows:—

"I was rather pained to hear Sir Alexander Arbuthnot quoting the occurrence of two or three acts of violence of some Natives. I cannot see how the commission of brutal crimes, which are committed by men in other countries as well as by some Natives of India, can affect the character of Native gentlemen who are likely to exercise criminal jurisdiction under this Bill."

Certainly not; and it is unnecessary to say that; if any one will refer to the words used by Sir Alexander Arbuthnot, it will be seen that no such idiotic suggestion was ever offered. We do not doubt that Lord Kimberley had imperfectly heard the words used; for it would be difficult to frame a more disingenuous or more misleading distortion of their obvious meaning, if they had been clearly heard. Unfortunately, however, it will now be impossible for the Secretary of State to set right the mistake into which he was betrayed; for in the summary of the proceedings that appears in all the leading provincial papers, Sir Alexander Arbuthnot's words are not given—whilst it is stated that Lord Kimberley "refuted the argument that because certain Natives had committed outrages, Native gentlemen were not fitted to be charged with the jurisdiction under the Bill!" We feel sure that Lord Kimberley will deeply regret the gross misrepresentation of the case against the Ilbert Bill, to which currency has been given by his odd mistake.

RADICAL EXULTATION OVER THE PERSECUTION OF ANGLO-INDIANS.

In the earlier stage of the Ilbert Bill controversy, the Echo distinguished itself among the Radical papers of England by calling on Lord Ripon to "crush" the Anglo-Indian worms that turned against his persecuting policy. But now that Mr. John Bright and Sir Wilfrid Lawson have come forward to aid in the "crushing" process, and Mr. Gladstone's Government has announced that it has not the "slightest intention" of interfering with the amiable work, some other Radical journals have joined in the hunt. The Manchester Examiner of July 27 says:—

"Great satisfaction is expressed in Liberal circles at the decision of the Cabinet to support the Indian Government in pressing forward the Ilbert Bill. The deputation, which waited this afternoon upon Lord Kimberley to protest against the measure, received a firm and emphatic answer, such as is not often given at once to deputations on subjects of so much importance."

And the Western Morning News is equally vindictive, though it has the conscience to hide its rancour under the suggestion (which every one who has taken the trouble to study the question, or who has read Sir Alexander Arbuthnot's speech of last Thursday, knows to be false) that the point at issue is the treatment of Natives rather than the treatment of Anglo-Indians. It says:—

"Those energetic Anglo-Indians who went to Lord Kimberley to-day to protest against Lord Ripon's policy towards the Natives got a decided snub from the India Secretary. They were, at all events, very clearly told that it was not the intention of Her Majesty's Government to sacrifice a Viceroy to race prejudices, even the prejudices of Englishmen. In other words, the agitation has already failed, and the only chance now of changing the policy is a change of Government, which fifty thousand Anglo-Indians will hardly be able to accomplish."

The Western Morning News is one of the most well-informed, as well as one of the cleverest papers in England on the Ministerialist side; and we fear that the indication, which is here given, of the obstinate determination of Mr. Gladstone's Government to imperil the Empire rather than risk any discredit falling on a Gladstonian Viceroy, only too truly represents the present attitude of the Ministerial mind. A comparison of the circumstances of, let us say, the Kandahar scuttle with the recent Suez Canal fiasco shows clearly that this Government is only amenable to intimidation, not to argument; and we fear that Mr. Gladstone shares the contemptuous opinion of the Western Morning News as to the political weight, from a strictly party point of view, of "fifty thousand Anglo-Indians."

Doubtless the Radical laugh will only grow louder, when Anglo-Indians indignantly ask whether this is right—whether it is right that political questions vitally affecting the stability, nay, the very existence of our Indian Empire, should be settled in defiance, and almost in derision, of the earnest convictions of the whole body of those who alone possess any practical knowledge of the points at issue. Might is the only right recognised in the Radical creed; and when it is found, on counting heads, that the number of those qualified to form any intelligent opinion on the merits of the Ilbert Bill is not more formidable than the "fifty thousand Anglo-Indians" of the Western Morning News, the absurdity of supposing that any question of right or wrong could outweigh the risk of impugning the infallibility of a Radical Viceroy is abundantly evident.

But is the political impotence of the Anglo-Indian interest, the much despised fifty thousand, so entirely certain and unquestionable as the Western Morning News and Mr. Gladstone evidently believe? When we look at the ramifications of the vast and ever-increasing export and import trade of India with England—when we consider the gigantic investments of English capital in Indian railways, Indian tea-gardens, Indian factories, Indian mines, mills, banks, and other industrial enterprises—when we observe the active part taken by retired Anglo-Indians in the local politics of nearly every important town in England—and when, lastly, we remember that the interests of every man connected with all these various commercial and industrial undertakings are being trampled upon, and threatened with utter ruin, for no better reason than that the credit of a partisan Viceroy should not suffer—we begin to see that the political impotence, over which the Radicals are making merry, must be due, not to lack of influence but solely to lack of organisation. We implore our Anglo-Indian readers to take to heart the old proverb, that the weakest goes to the wall—and then to recollect that union is strength. The "European and Anglo-Indian Defence Association" in India, called into existence by Lord Ripon's persecutions, has set us a noble example. We trust that the "Anglo-Indian Association (London Committee)" for obtaining the withdrawal of the Ilbert Bill" will not only constitute itself into a permanent corporation for the protection and promotion of Anglo-Indian interests in England, but will also draw into union with itself all the various allied interests mentioned above; and when this has been done, we venture to predict we shall hear no more of Radical jeers about "fifty thousand Anglo-Indians."

THIRD YEAR OF PUBLICATION. REVISED AND ENLARGED.

THE VOICE OF INDIA. A NEW
MAGAZINE INTENDED TO GIVE EX- PRESSION TO THE PUBLIC OPINION OF INDIA.

There are in England large classes willing and anxious to do justice to India, but they find it very difficult to know how to act. They complain that Indian questions are intricate; that the opinions of official experts are contradictory; and that the people of India are dumb, and do not give expression to their needs. This defect it is now desired to remedy, by publishing monthly in Bombay a magazine somewhat similar in nature to Public Opinion in England, which will provide a compendium of all that is most valuable in the native journals throughout India on the leading topics of the day. It is hoped that the Voice of India will thus give forth a clear sound, interpreting between the rulers and the ruled, and making known the true wishes and feelings of the Indian people.

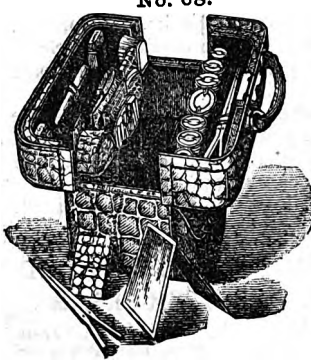

The Magazine will advocate no views of its own. It will seek only to reflect with care and accuracy the views set forth in the native press. The Indian people are naturally docile and conservative; and it is believed that the writings thus brought before the English public will be found to be characterised by a knowledge of facts, and generally by practical good sense and moderation. No doubt grievances will from time to time be set forth; but it is a policy of prudence no less than of justice to give these grievances a fair constitutional hearing. Accordingly, it is hoped that this publication will be welcomed by all Members of Parliament desirous of dealing with Indian questions, and that the facts thus brought together in a convenient form will be of value to journalists and other public writers. It is specially desired to bring the Magazine before the public in clubs, reading-rooms, libraries, and institutes throughout England, with a view to promote a sustained and intelligent interest in the welfare of our Indian Empire, comprising as it does 220 millions of our fellow-subjects.

ABRIDGED PROSPECTUS.

The Directors of the Eastern Telegraph Company, Limited, are prepared to receive subscriptions for £500,000 £4 per Cent. Mortgage Debenture Stock, issued under the authority of Special Resolutions, by which the Company's Mortgage Debenture Stock constitutes a first charge on the undertaking and revenue of the Company, and the total amount issuable is never to exceed one-third of the paid-up share capital of the Company for the time being.

The share capital consists of £3,800,000 Ordinary and £700,000 Preference Shares, both classes being at a premium.

The present issue is made for redemption of Terminable Debentures falling due in October next, and for payment for the Trieste-Corfu Telegraph Cable, and other important expenditures on capital account.

The Company was formed in 1872 by amalgamation of four then existing separate companies. It now owns about 18,250 miles of submarine telegraph cable, consisting of duplicate, and in some cases triplicate, lines, between England, Spain, Portugal, Gibraltar, Malta, Egypt, Aden, and Bombay, with a series of cables between Italy and Greece and the islands of the Levant, and extending to Cyprus, Syra, and Constantinople, from whence a cable of the Black Sea Telegraph Company, worked by the Company, runs to Odessa.

The Company's cables are, with few exceptions, laid in depths of water which permit repairs being made with facility and economy by its own ships.

The net revenue of the Company, after paying all working and other expenses, income tax, &c., for the three years ending March 31, 1883, was as follows:—

|      |     |     |     |     |     |          |
|------|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|----------|
| 1881 | ... | ... | ... | ... | ... | £367,523 |
| 1882 | ... | ... | ... | ... | ... | £368,882 |
| 1883 | ... | ... | ... | ... | ... | £400,777 |

and the dividends and bonus paid on the ordinary shares have been in the corresponding periods at the rate of 5½ per cent., 5½ per cent., and 6 per cent.

The reserve funds at March 31, 1883, of the Company (accumulated from revenue) stood at £569,828, of which £328,574 was at that date invested in securities.

Subscriptions in any of the existing debentures of the Company will be accepted, at par, in lieu of cash, and credit given for the interest thereon up to the first half-yearly date for payment of interest on the Debenture stock.

This Union if formed to maintain the ancient marriage law of the land, and in particular to resist the legalising marriage with a wife's sister.

Its efforts are directed to organising Committees throughout the United Kingdom, to diffusing information by lectures, publications, and otherwise on a subject on which public opinion has been much misled, to encouraging Petitions to both Houses of Parliament, and to directing the attention of the Legislature to the true bearings of the question. A Ladies' Committee has been formed to assist the Union.

The whole principal of which the Marriage Law of this land is based is involved in the acceptance or rejection of the Deceased Wife's Sister Bill. In all countries where the Marriage Law has been relaxed in this one particular, other relaxations have, after some lapse of time, been adopted; in some countries not only may a woman marry her sister's husband, and a man marry his brother's wife, and his wife's niece, or, as in the State of New York, his wife's daughter, but in others a man is freely permitted to marry his niece by blood.

As the operations of the Union are very extensive, Subscriptions and Donations are earnestly requested. All Cheques and Post Office Orders to be crossed either Herries, Farquhar, and Co., or Glyn, Mills, and Co.

It will be obvious that the publications circulated by this Union, although the arguments and considerations contained in them, point to the same conclusion, represent in particulars only the mind of their respective authors.

THE PROCEEDINGS AT THE DEPUTATION TO THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY TO OBTAIN THE WITHDRAWAL OF THE INDIAN CRIMINAL PROCEDURE ACT AMENDMENT BILL, THURSDAY, JULY 26.

MONDAY, JULY 30, 1883.

THE ILBERT BILL.

DEPUTATION TO THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

ON Thursday, the 26th of July, an influential deputation waited upon the Earl of Kimberley (Secretary of State for India in Council), to present a memorial from the London Committee of the Anglo-Indian Association for obtaining the withdrawal of the Indian Criminal Procedure Act Amendment Bill. His lordship, with whom was Mr. J. K. Cross, M.P., Under Secretary, received the deputation at the Indian Office. The following is the memorial:—

TO THE RIGHT HON. THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY, HER MAJESTY'S SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA IN COUNCIL.

The memorial of the undersigned members of the London Committee of Anglo Indians for obtaining the withdrawal of the Indian Criminal Procedure Act Amendment Bill,

RESPECTFULLY SHOWETH,

That your memorialists view with the deepest apprehension and concern the Indian Criminal Procedure Act Amendment Bill, which has been introduced into the Council of the Governor General of India for the purpose of conferring upon certain native magistrates and judges in the Mofussil criminal jurisdiction over European British subjects. Your memorialists—many of whom have spent the greater portions of their lives in India, and have filled positions in which their experience has been such as to enable them to speak with confidence of the merits of this proposal—unanimously believe that the measure is not justified by any necessity, either political or administrative; they observe with regret that it has already aroused wide-spread excitement and agitation throughout India; and they feel sure that its results, if it be passed into law, will be prejudicial to the peace and prosperity of the Indian Empire.

2. Your memorialists desire respectfully to state their conviction that the existing law—which has been arrived at after the fullest discussion at various times—admirably fulfils all the requirements of justice, with the least possible administrative inconvenience, and to the entire satisfaction of those whose interests are affected by it. This fact seems to be amply proved by the consideration that, during the whole course of the protracted deliberations on the Criminal Procedure Code—deliberations which lasted over several years, and were shared by all the Local Governments and by officials of all ranks in every province—it has never been alleged that there has been any miscarriage of justice, or any practical hardship to anyone, owing to the criminal jurisdiction over European British subjects in India having been confined to persons of the same race. Your memorialists are unable to see that the proposed measure can be regarded as in any way a continuation of the policy indicated in former legislation upon this subject; for preceding enactments have been directed to the removal of real and substantial hardships, whereas the present Bill proposes to substitute, for a system which has given general satisfaction, one which is avowedly distasteful to the whole European population, and for which at the commencement there was no genuine demand on the part of the native community.

3. With reference to the plea of administrative convenience, which has been alleged by the supporters of the Bill as a reason for the proposed alteration of the law, your memorialists desire to ask your lordship's consideration of the very important fact, that the Bill, if passed, will have a two-fold effect—one qualifying or enabling, the other disqualifying or disabling. On the one hand, it will extend, under certain conditions, criminal jurisdiction over European British subjects to four classes of Native magistrates—(1) Native covenanted civilians selected by competition in England; (2) Native civilians appointed in India under 33 Victoria c. 3; (3) and (4) Native assistant commissioners in non-regulation Provinces and Native cantonment magistrates. This is the extent of the qualifying or enabling effect of the Bill. On the other hand, is disabling operation will be very wide indeed. For the Government will be deprived by it of the services, in future appointments to the office of justice of the peace, of the whole European uncovenanted and non-official communities throughout the land. A reference to the published lists of existing justices of the peace will show at a glance the sweeping character of this wholesale disqualification; and your memorialists are strongly of opinion that an enactment which deprives the Government of the valuable and approved aid of European planters, merchants, railway police officers, and other non-official and uncovenanted Europeans as justices of the peace, stands self-condemned, as one that may lead to something like a deadlock in the administration of justice in important planting and mining districts, and must cause serious administrative inconvenience in every province.

4. Your memorialists would therefore venture to urge that the Bill, so far from removing administrative inconvenience, will create it. They entirely agree with the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal—whose authority on the point, indeed, is such as to need no confirmation—that no administrative inconvenience has arisen, or is at present likely to arise, out of the existing state of the law. Indeed, your memorialists would go further, and would express their conviction that the probability of any such inconvenience arising at any future time is extremely small. Even if the proportion of the Native members of the Civil Service should be eventually increased under the operation of 33 Victoria, c. 3, to one-sixth, as the Governor-General anticipates, your memorialists believe that, in these days of railways, no practical difficulty is likely to arise in dealing with the few cases of criminal offences committed by Europeans at places where there may be no European magistrate. The distances to which such cases will have to be transferred will generally, not be great, nor will the journey occupy much time, or entail much expense, if a moderate amount of discretion be observed in regard to the posting of Native magistrates and judges. But, as regards the present and the immediate future, the effect of the Bill will be the reverse of an administrative improvement. The class of Native covenanted civilians selected in England by competition is a very small one, and not likely to be increased, and only two members of it will be at once effected by the Bill. The class of Native civilians appointed in India under 33 Vict. c. 3, is a new and untried one, in regard to which it is impossible for anyone to predict whether the experiment which has been made in instituting it will turn out well or ill; but no member of it is likely for some years to exercise the jurisdiction in question, so that in any case this class need not be taken into present account in considering the question of administrative convenience. There are no Native cantonment magistrates, and it is understood that the Government has pledged itself not to appoint any. It is possible that a few of the Native assistant commissioners in non-regulation provinces will receive the extended jurisdiction. On the whole, however, it is obvious that the Bill, in disqualifying the large classes of Europeans above named for future appointment to the office of justice of the peace, must create an administrative inconvenience far greater than any that it removes under its enabling clauses.

5. The facts adduced by your memorialists in the last paragraph have been used by the supporters of the Bill to minimise the importance of the proposed change. But those who are likely to be affected by legislation, which they believe to be in itself hurtful, justly look to the possibilities opened up by it rather than to the extent of its immediate operation. Moreover, in such a matter, in regard to which no one can say whether he himself may not be the one sufferer from even the most limited application of the new law, the number of persons who will immediately acquire the extended jurisdiction naturally seems, and is, a point of comparatively little importance to the class directly concerned; though the insignificance of that number clearly disposes of the plea of a present administrative convenience. Your memorialists would further point out that nearly all the tea grown in India is produced in districts under the criminal jurisdiction of assistant commissioners, who may now be Natives, and who, if the bill be passed, might be invested with the power to try Europeans. The fact that the danger threatened to isolated Europeans, in the Mofussil under this bill, is a very real and serious one, and by no means the sentimental one it is sometimes represented to be, was frankly and forcibly admitted by the Hon. Sir Stuart Bayley in the debate of March 9. The Hon. Member then said:—"There is another aspect to the case of the opposition, which, I think, deserves most attentive consideration, and this is the real danger which the isolated European, living in the Mofussil, runs from having false cases trumped up against him. It is right that I should state publicly that this danger is a very real and very serious one, for probably no member of this Council has had the same experience as I have of the lives led by planters in the Mofussil. My own experience has given me a strong feeling on this matter; and anyone who knows the extreme bitterness with which disputes about land are fought out in the Mofussil, and the unscrupulous methods to which recourse is had in conducting these disputes before the Court—methods to which a planter cannot have recourse—will understand how precarious his position may become, and how essential it is to him that the law should be well and wisely administered." The experience of your memorialists entirely coincides with that of Sir Stuart Bayley.

6. It has been alleged that a slur is cast on the Native civilians, by a state of the law which prevents them from exercising the special jurisdiction over European British subjects entrusted to their European colleagues. Your memorialists are unable to see how the denial of a right to try a particular class—a right which can hardly be considered to be inherent in anyone—can be regarded as a slur. It is not considered a slur on the Lord Chief Justice of England that he is unable, unless he happens to be a peer, to sit in judgment on peers. But, however this may be, your memorialists believe that this argument of the supporters of the bill is distinctly barred by the consideration that the privilege as to jurisdiction is the privilege of the prisoner, not the privilege of the judge. The question which is really at issue in this matter is not whether a certain jurisdiction ought to be conferred upon certain public functionaries; but whether the requirements of the administration of justice demand that a certain class of persons should be deprived of a privilege which they have long enjoyed and which they greatly value.

7. The argument in the favour of the Bill which is based on the "anomalous" character of the existing system, can hardly be regarded as a serious argument in a country and under an administration which are alike full of anomalies. It is almost unnecessary for your memorialists to point out that the anomalous privileges possessed and prized by various classes of Natives are not only numerous, but also, in many cases, far more open to objection than this privilege of the European British subject. Some of these privileges are anomalies that seriously interfere with the due administration of justice; and the abolition of them, if Europeans and Natives are to be made perfectly equal in the eyes of the law by such abolition, would cause far deeper resentment on the part of the latter than the proposed change of jurisdiction has among the former. Your memorialists allude to the privileged exemption from personal appearance, as witnesses in courts of justice, of Native ladies and of men of position, to whom such exemption is granted by Government as a mark of exceptional respectability; as well as to the serious hindrance to equitable procedure in Courts, brought about by the objection on the part of Brahmins and other high caste Natives to the admittance within the precincts of the Courts of low caste people, whose touch, or even whose standing on the same carpet, is considered personal pollution by the former, and entails the immediate performance of expiatory religious ceremonies. For a parallel to the anomaly complained of by the supporters of the bill, your memorialists can point to the refusal of the Governments of all Western nations to submit to the trial of their subjects by Native Courts in Turkey, Egypt, China, and elsewhere. If it be argued that in British India there exists an equitable law to which all are alike amenable, your memorialists feel bound to assert that the just administration of a good law depends even more on its administrators than on the law itself; and that the very slight and superficial acquaintance with the feelings, modes of thought, and customs of Europeans possessed, or likely to be possessed, by Native civilians—until the breakdown of the caste system in India and the introduction of female education into that country shall render possible intimate social relations between Natives and Europeans—must for many years render those to whom the extended jurisdiction is proposed to be given ill-suited in most instances to judge in criminal cases where Europeans are concerned. If your memorialists are met with the argument that there are Native judges in the High Courts, and Native police magistrates in the Presidency towns, with whose administration of justice no fault has been found, your memorialists would point out the difference in circumstances, where these officials are controlled by the presence of learned European colleagues, of public opinion, a powerful European Press, and a competent Bar, and where, as in the Mofussil, the Native magistrate must himself be judge and jury, prosecutor and counsel for both accuser and accused, with a subservient staff, and no public opinion to hold him in check. As regards the Native judges of the High Courts, your memorialists would observe, that hitherto, as far as they are aware, there has never been an instance of a Native judge of a high court presiding at the Criminal Sessions, and that when trying appeals in criminal cases the Native judge is invariably associated with an English judge. In Ceylon, too, on the other hand, the circumstances of the non-official European community are almost exactly the same as those which obtain in the Presidency towns of India; within a very limited area there is a numerous, powerful, and highly-concentrated European population, possessing all those safeguards which are conspicuously wanting in the Indian Mofussil. Your memorialists would further point out, that when a Native of India has once entered the covenanted Civil Service, his promotion to the head of an office is virtually merely a matter of time; and that the refusal of such promotion by the Local Government, possibly for very valid reasons that might be incapable of exact legal demonstration, would be impossible without raising far more heart-burning on the part of the Native community, and far greater race-antipathy, than the present entirely unexpected action of the Government of India has aroused. Moreover, the present bill does not by any means remove from the Code of Criminal Procedure all anomalies based upon distinctions of race. If the bill is passed, Natives of India will still be liable in certain cases to be tried and sentenced to very heavy penalties by English judges, who, notwithstanding their nationality, have no similar jurisdiction over European British subjects.

8. It has been strongly represented by the supporters of this bill that the objection which is now urged to the exercise of Criminal jurisdiction by Natives over Europeans is exactly similar to that which was formerly urged to the exercise of Civil jurisdiction by Natives over Europeans, and that experience has proved that none of the evil consequences which were anticipated in the latter case have been found to result. But your memorialists wish to point out that there is no parallel between the two cases. Civil suits are not used for mere purposes of revenge. Defeat in a civil suit involves no consequences similar to those which follow from conviction on a criminal charge, and if an unjust decision is ultimately reversed, even after years of litigation, the party who is ultimately successful is replaced in the exact position which he would have occupied if a right judgment had originally been passed. But no ultimate reversal of a conviction could ever undo the fatal injury which would be entailed upon an innocent man who had, even for a single week, been consigned to gaol as a convicted criminal.

9. Under the bill, Englishwomen in India will be liable to be tried on criminal charges before Native magistrates. It is almost unnecessary for your memorialists to point out that the position of the female sex in the social system of India has not been appreciably affected by that contact with Western ideas, which has done so much for India in other respects. That social system is still founded on polygamy and on the strict seclusion of women. Publicity of any kind is, in the case of any respectable Native female, an utterly infamous thing; and it seems obvious that Native magistrates, brought up under such a social system and living in it, rigorously secluding their own wives and daughters, whose faces may not be looked on, either in court or elsewhere, by the eye of any male stranger, are certainly not qualified (however high may be their moral character or intellectual abilities) to sit in judgment on Englishwomen charged with criminal offences. Your memorialists believe it to be absolutely impossible for Native magistrates, so nurtured, so educated, and so circumstanced, adequately to appreciate the motives, or weigh the words and actions, of Englishwomen; and the consequences of extending to them this jurisdiction might therefore prove most disastrous. And this point will be seen to be even more serious than it would otherwise be, from the fact that the law of India differs altogether from the law of England, in that it treats some offences against domestic morality as criminal offences. When regard is had to the isolated position of numbers of English families in India, especially among the poorer classes—to the dangers of trumped-up charges, so forcibly dwelt upon by Sir Stuart Bayley—to the obvious openings that might be afforded for extortion or even worse, by the increased chances of impunity in bringing such false charges, and by the humiliation and disgrace that might be inflicted on the victim even by an unsuccessful charge—it must be at once evident how important, to the Englishwomen of India in particular, is that safeguard which has hitherto been secured to them, in the right to be tried by their own countrymen, who are fully acquainted with their habits and modes of thought, and are able to judge what is, and what is not, compatible with innocence in their conduct. Your memorialists believe it to be unnecessary to consider further how far Native magistrates may be qualified to try cases in which Englishmen are accused of criminal offences; for their disqualification in cases in which English women are concerned seems to be incontestable, and ought (your memorialists respectfully submit) to be in itself decisive as to the fate of the bill.

10. Attempts have been made, both in India and in England, to misrepresent the character of the opposition to the Bill by ascribing it wholly to the resentment which settlers belonging to the conquering race in India feel at any and every attempt to place them on an equality with the Native population. The agitation raised in Calcutta against the so-called "Black Act of 1838," which took away the exclusive jurisdiction of English judges of the Supreme Court in civil suits between Englishmen and Hindoos, is referred to as a case in point; and it has even been said that both official and non-official Englishmen in India have invariably shown a singular unanimity in resisting changes in the law intended to improve the condition of the Native population. Your memorialists are of opinion that no charge could be more unfounded. The essential difference of race, to which England owes the possession of her Indian Empire, cannot indeed be set aside without endangering the fabric which has been built upon it. The principle of English ascendancy penetrates the whole administration of India; it is recognised in the army and in every department of the civil service; and the Native civilians who now complain that they are deprived of the prospective right of exercising criminal jurisdiction over Europeans, might with as good reason, if their theory of equality were once admitted demand that they should no longer be excluded from the highest positions in the Executive Government of the country, which are still reserved, and if British rule in India is to continue, must be reserved, for Englishmen. But, so far as the administration of the law is concerned, your memorialists maintain that what is now proposed to be done by the Government of India has excited alarm, not because it offends the prejudices and lessens the privileges of a dominant class, but because it would deprive Englishmen and Englishwomen in India of a safeguard to which they attach the highest value. Englishmen in India want nothing more than justice, and they will be satisfied with nothing less. They do not believe that Native magistrates and judges are competent to decide cases affecting the liberty of isolated Englishmen who may unconsciously have incurred the ill will of their neighbours, and have thus exposed themselves to the risk of being arrested on false charges. This question is, as has been already shown, totally distinct from that of the transfer of civil jurisdiction, which affected rights of property only; and it may also be pointed out that the agitation against the Black Act of 1838 was really the outcome of the long-standing feud between the servants of the East India Company and the private adventurers who had courts of law of their own, and that what happened then belonged to a state of Indian society which has long since disappeared. In more recent times, since the creation of the High Courts, Europeans in India have acquiesced cheerfully in any reasonable extensions of the powers of Native judicial officers. Not a word of remonstrance has ever been uttered by them against the criminal jurisdiction over Europeans given to Native magistrates in the Presidency towns, because in this instance they are well assured that they have adequate securities for the due administration of justice. When, therefore, they object to the grant of this jurisdiction to Native officials in districts outside the limits of the Presidency towns, they should get credit for the moderation they have hitherto displayed, and not be met with the unreasoning cry that their protests are prompted by race feeling. The non-official English class in India occupy a peculiar and exceptional position. Their capital, their enterprise, their labour have marvelously developed the agricultural, the mineral, and the commercial resources of India, and converted that country into England's best customer. Their tried loyalty has made them respond zealously to the call of the Government of India to raise regiments of volunteers which might aid in the defence of the Empire; and, as members of the various legislative councils, as honorary magistrates in country districts, and as members of municipalities in the great towns, they have given the Government much valuable and unbought help in carrying on the work of administration. They are shut out from all high public offices, which are reserved for the covenanted civil servants appointed from England, and for Native nominees of the Government of India; and such slight account is taken of the feelings of this important class of the population, among whom there is very little poverty or crime, that, on a measure so vitally affecting their interests as Mr. Ilbert's Bill their opinion was not even sought by the Government before it determined to change the law. Surely non-official Anglo-Indians do not expect too much when they claim from the Government they serve so well freedom to carry on their business in India without being brought before Native magistrates, whom the all but unanimous judgment of Anglo-Indian officials pronounce to be ill-suited to deal in a satisfactory manner with criminal charges against Europeans. What makes the argument against the Bill all the stronger is, that if it becomes law, it will hardly be likely to injure the wealthier and more influential Europeans, whom the Natives, at all events for the present, will be afraid to conspire against. The merchant, the lawyer, the planter may escape; but the Bill will smite with terrible effect the unprotected planter's assistant and the skilled mechanic, who are the bone and sinew of English enterprise in India.

II. Your memorialists have now set forth, they trust without passion or exaggeration, the reasons which have induced them earnestly to entreat the Government to pause and retrace its steps on the dangerous path on which it has entered. Although this bill will more especially affect the non-official Englishman, and in particular the poorer members of that class, the opposition to it is not less strong on the part of the great body of Anglo-Indian officials, past and present. Of the signatories to this memorial, a large majority belong to the official class. Among them are men who have risen through all the grades of the Anglo-Indian official hierarchy, who have long been known to be actuated by the most kindly sentiments towards the Natives of India, and to whom it cannot, with the slightest semblance of reason, be imputed that they are influenced by prejudices of race, or by any other motive than a sincere desire for the good government of the country in which they have passed the greater part of their lives. The opinions which your memorialists have formed, and the remarks which they have offered for your lordship's consideration, are the result of long experience and of careful observation of Indian life in all its varied phases, and they submit those opinions and those remarks with an earnest hope that a measure which they believe to be alike prejudicial to the best interests of the Natives of India, and dangerous to the safety of Her Majesty's dominion will not be passed into law; for it is certain that this bill, if it be persisted in, will keep alive in the future those mischievous race antipathies which its introduction has revived, and thereby will seriously add to the difficulties, already sufficiently great, of Indian administration.

All which your memorialists would humbly submit to your lordship.

Mr. PUGH, M.P., in introducing the deputation said: My Lord, the deputation which I have the honour to introduce to your lordship is, I very much think, the most influential deputation that has ever been received between these walls. The deputation represents a committee consisting of 700 members and I have carefully analysed the composition of the committee, but I am not going to weary your Lordship in any details upon the subject. My intention was to point out how many men there were upon that Council who were distinguished for their services in India, but I found the list so large that it would be impossible for me within any reasonable compass to make any individual mention of the more prominent of those members. But I would say this, that of the 700 somewhere about 250 only are non-official Europeans; that leaves something over 450 men who have held service under Her Majesty in India, and many more of these my Lord are distinguished for services which they rendered to the country; and they are distinguished very much in this respect, that many of them had long been, and will be, known for the earliest desire they had always shown for the advancement of the Natives of India. Now, the object of this deputation is to lay before your lordship their views upon the Bill now pending before the Council in India for the amendment of the Criminal Procedure Code. I do not propose to enter myself into any argument upon the subject. I shall content myself with introducing the deputation to your lordship, and the deputation will state temperately and yet fully, I have no doubt, their views upon the subject. And my lord, the deputation are moved to take this measure owing very much to the repeated assurances, given by Lord Ripon in his speech upon this Bill before the Legislative Council in Calcutta, of his desire to keep himself clear from all controversy so that he might give a full and impartial consideration to all the representations which might be made to him by the local governors or by the public with reference to the objection that they might feel to the Bill. Those assurances of Lord Ripon the deputation entirely accept, and for myself I will say that I have not the slightest doubt all those representations will receive from Lord Ripon the fullest and most careful consideration. The deputation being here in England, they have thought that the proper way to lay their views before the Government of India would be through this deputation which your lordship has kindly consented to receive. Now I add it been, as has been stated more than once, the desire of those who oppose this bill to attack the general policy of Lord Ripon, I should not in any way for my own part have consented to ask your lordship to receive this deputation; nor if they desired in any way to attack the Rent Bill of Lord Ripon, should I have consented to have anything to do with the deputation; nor if they had proposed to come here in order to oppose any extension of local self-government in India, should I have in any way consented to have anything to do with it. But my views being in accordance with the views of the deputation with regard to this one particular Bill, I have no hesitation in consenting to asking your lordship to receive this deputation. Now, the object of all those who study the welfare of India, I take it, must be to endeavour to adopt and to agree upon such measures as will conduce to the different races that inhabit the country acting together in greater harmony; and I may say for myself, my lord, that during the twenty years in which I have known India, I believe the different races in India have been hitherto approximating more and more closely towards each other and I am sure it is the wish of every member of this deputation to see that approximation continue without let or hindrance. And it is because they do not think that this bill is calculated to promote that approximation, but that it will have the directly contrary effect—it is on that account, and I believe on that account alone, that they wish to make public their views in reference to this measure. My lord, I shall not trouble you with any further remarks in introducing the deputation; but Sir Alexander Arbuthnot will now address your lordship. He, as your lordship is aware, was formerly a member of the Council, and I may say also that he has been distinguished above all other things for his efforts in the cause of Native education, and the advancement of the Natives generally in the Presidency of Madras, and in fact throughout the rest of India. I trust that the views of the deputation will be such as to commend themselves to your lordship, and I trust also that when Lord Ripon enters upon that full consideration of the views of the various local governors in India he will not fail also to consider the views which will have been laid before your lordship to-day by this deputation, and that the result of that consideration will be the withdrawal of this bill. (Hear, hear.) I beg to introduce to your lordship Sir Alexander Arbuthnot.

Sir ALEXANDER ARBUTHNOT: My Lord, I have been requested to present to your lordship this memorial on behalf of a large body of gentlemen, who either are or have been connected with India, praying for reasons which are fully stated, that Her Majesty's Government will be pleased to order the withdrawal of the Indian Criminal Procedure Act Amendment Bill which is now pending before the Council of the Governor General. I think that after all has been said by Mr. Pugh it is not necessary for me to disclaim, as I should wish to disclaim in the most emphatic terms, the importation that any who are associated with me in this movement are actuated by hostile or illiberal feelings towards the Natives of India. (Hear, hear.) For my own part I think I may truly affirm that during my long Indian service, one of the most prominent objects to which my time and attention were constantly given was the moral and intellectual advancement of the people of the country, and the fulfilment of the pledges which had been given, and the prospects which had been held out to them by the most prominent Indian Statesmen of former times. (Hear, hear.) In the memorial which I am about to present to your lordship, there is a very full statement of the reasons which have led the opponents of this bill to regard it as an uncalled-for measure, and as one which, while it is not demanded in the interests of the small sections of the Native community whom it will immediately affect, is calculated to be most prejudicial, in our notion, to the best interests of Her Majesty's Empire in India. I will not attempt to go over those reasons, but there are a few points connected with this matter which I should like to urge upon your lordship's attention. In the first place, I am aware that it is thought by many persons, and even by some who have considered the introduction of this Bill, to have been unwise, that after the hopes and expectations which have been aroused in the Native mind, and after all the agitation which has taken place, it is now too late to withdraw the measure. This consideration, and the consideration that the Government of a great Empire having once introduced such a measure as this, can hardly recede from it without some loss to its credit and reputation, all considerations which must naturally be weighed by Her Majesty's Government. We who are urging the withdrawal of this Bill, do not at all ignore the considerations to which I have referred; but our contention is that in this case, as in so many other cases which occur constantly in human affairs, the Government have a choice of difficulties, and that the real question is not whether there is a course which is absolutely free from objection, but which of two or three courses, all of them more or less open to question, is likely on the whole to be conducive to the welfare of the Indian Empire. (Hear, hear.) Looking at the question from this point of view as practical men, intimately acquainted with the Natives of India, appreciating their merits and knowing their defects, we are persuaded that the mischief of presenting this Bill will be far greater than the inconvenience of withdrawing it. We feel sure that this Bill, if it be persisted in, will be a permanent cause of antipathies of race, and we are convinced that if this Bill shall become law, certainly on a great many occasions, though not perhaps on every occasion, declamations will be made in the Anglo-Indian newspapers, which will be followed by those denunciations of British rule and of the English race which have lately been revived in the native press, and that a state of things would arise which cannot fail to be most prejudicial to the interests of India and to the sincerity of our rule. And here I should like to observe that the agitation which has arisen upon this subject on the point of the natives of India was originally a purely factitious agitation that, on the part of the great bulk of the native community of India, there was no demand for this Bill—(hear, hear)—and that even now many—some, at all events, of the best men among the natives deprecate the measure as one which was uncalled for in the interests of the natives of India, and is certain to effect injuriously their relations with their English fellow subjects. Before I sit down I should like to invite your special attention to the argument which is urged in the memorial as to the real nature of the question which is at issue in this case. We have submitted that the real question is not whether a certain jurisdiction should be conferred upon certain native functionaries, but whether Englishmen in India should be deprived of a privilege which they have hitherto enjoyed, and to which they attach the greatest importance. Our contention is that the withdrawal of that privilege is not only undesirable on other grounds, but that it is certain to have a bad political effect in diminishing the prestige and impairing the authority of Englishmen in India, and if proof be needed of the soundness of this contention I must ask your lordship to consider some incidents which have occurred at Calcutta within the last few weeks. When we hear of a native servant of the lowest class attempting with brutal violence to ravish an English lady—the wife of the Public Prosecutor at Calcutta, and of another native servant, who had been recently discharged, entering the bedroom in which his late master and mistress were sleeping, and then proceeding to cut to pieces the lady's dresses and to cut off her hair; when also we read of another somewhat similar outrage on an Eurasian woman, the wife of a railway employé in the neighbourhood of Calcutta; and when we read of the editor of a native newspaper urging the forming of an enormous national fund to be raised by subscriptions in every village for the purpose of enabling the Natives of India to obtain Parliamentary institutions, for which they are notoriously unfit, and urging upon his audience “to kindle a fire upon the altar of their country, which all the water of the Ganges will not put out,” I submit that it needs a very moderate clearness of political foresight to discern the evils which are certain to result from this Bill. It has been said, and still is said, by the supporters of this bill, that its provisions are in accordance with the opinions held by the wisest and most eminent Indian statesmen of past times. The names, which are most commonly mentioned, are those of Sir Thomas Munro and Mr. Elphinstone; but it is only by ignoring or suppressing important passages in the writings of those distinguished men, that it is possible to arrive at the conclusion which the advocates of the new legislation seek to establish. One single sentence in the famous minute of Sir Thomas Munro on the Indian Press, where he says:—“I can't view the question of a free press in this country without feeling that the tenure with which we hold our power never has been, and never will be, the improvement of the people,” is, I think, amply sufficient to show what the opinion of the distinguished statesmen would have been on a question of depriving Englishmen in India of the privilege of being subject in criminal cases to the exclusive jurisdiction of their country. (Hear, hear.) With these remarks, my lord, I will submit to your lordship's a copy of the memorial.

Mr. W. S. SETON-KARR (formerly judge of the High Court, Bengal, and also Foreign Secretary to the Governor of India)—My Lord: In the few remarks which I shall have the honour to address to your lordship, and which I wish to compress into the smallest space possible, I will not speculate whether the distrust as to this measure which is avowedly felt in India proceeds from some deeper distrust of other measures of the administration which seem destined to break the continuity of tradition, and to impair the efficiency of the machinery of Government; nor shall I, on the other hand, expatiate on the arguments and counter arguments for or against the bill which your lordship will find set forth in the memorial which we have this day the honour of presenting to you, and set forth in language, I trust, which it is not disrespectful or unconstitutional for us to offer and which it cannot be offensive to your lordship to receive. But I would briefly request your lordship's consideration to three points connected with the opposition to this bill. Your lordship is probably aware, and your able officers who surround you will confirm my statement, that on many occasions when important measures have been under discussion, which effected the welfare of the Natives of India, the non-official and the official world have been prominently divided into two camps. I can say from my own knowledge, and I shall be confirmed by others, that in past times it has fallen to the lot of many officials of Government to explain, or to defend, or to promulgate those measures of Government which, with equal honesty of purpose and with equal sincerity of conviction the non-official community have thought it their duty to oppose. I may remind you, I say, that in past time we the officials of India, have had to carry through those measures, and we have been denounced for doing it, with that freedom of thought and that energy of language which with Englishmen everywhere is the very salt and breath of their political life. But on the present occasion all those divisions amongst English society have entirely disappeared. We are here met together, men of every variety of occupation and of every variety of experience, from almost every province of India, and I believe that from the non-official community, from merchants, from barristers, from civilians and military men, there never has been on any previous occasion such a remarkable unanimity of sentiment or such extraordinary consensus of opinion. That is one point to which I would earnestly request your lordship's close and careful attention. Secondly, I would ask your lordship to remember that we cannot be taxed with any selfish purposes in opposing this Bill. Many of us, as the chairman of our committee has reminded you, have taken a deep interest in the cause of Native progress and the advancement of Native civilisation. I may say frankly that we owe everything we have in the world to India. India, with all its drawbacks, has given to most of us a career of which we are justly proud, and if we have attained, any one of us, any honour from the State, any esteem from the public, if in any shape whatever, either by commercial fitness, by forensic ability, or by official aptitude, we have achieved success or an independence in life, it is to India and its career that we owe it all—(hear, hear)—and as our chairman has reminded you, there are many of us who would far sooner prefer to dwell on the many good points in the Native character, on their touching acts of devotion, on their fidelity in service, on their readiness to follow where Englishmen lead—we would far rather, I say, at this distance of time and place, recall those features than aggravate antipathies of race by dwelling too long on well-known instances of oriental turpitude and on Asiatic treachery. We can none of us here, at this distance of time and place, be actuated by any other than the kindest feelings towards the Natives of India. (Hear, hear.) Then thirdly, there is another point to which I would call your lordship's attention. It has been said in many papers that the agitation against the bill is factitious and temporary, and that the desire for the bill is permanent and genuine. We have every reason to believe, from private correspondence, from our attentive study of the comments of the Press, and from our knowledge of India, that the very contrary is the case. (Hear, hear.) We believe, on the contrary, that this agitation for the bill has been got up mainly by a few interested individuals. I would take the liberty of stating to your lordship that a journal accredited with some knowledge of India, and avowedly a supporter of your own Government, has maintained a silence on this important subject which to me is more ominous and more eloquent than all the pleadings of a deputation; and that journal has stated, and I doubt not, on good authority, that 90 per cent. of the so-called Natives of India have never heard of the bill and do not care one farthing about it. (Hear, hear.) We believe, on the contrary, that the agitation which the bill has evoked amongst the Anglo-Indian community will not pass away quickly. As a proof of it, there is one circumstance hitherto unexampled in Indian history, and that is, that Englishwomen have for the first time thought it necessary to descend into the arena of controversy, and have sent forth a protest against the passing of this Bill. And although I do not anticipate for a moment that Englishwomen resident in India would furnish many examples of the criminal classes, yet at the same time I would avail myself of this fact to illustrate what has been often said about anomalies and inequalities. Can there be a greater anomaly than the position of the Kannee or the Begum, whose seclusion in the Zenana is inviolate, practically against the pursuit of justice and against the arm of the law, and the position of the English lady or the wife of the English employé who lives openly in the light of day, who is amenable as a witness or defendant in every court, and who sheds about her, unlike her Aryan sister, that indescribable charm which the presence of a refined and energetic Englishwoman always sheds in the social and domestic circle. (Hear, hear.) There was one occasion when twenty years ago the community of India was violently agitated regarding the passing of a measure which affected Native interest. That measure as your lordship's advisers will tell you, commanded the support of very high and noble minded statesmen including amongst others the late Lord Canning. Your eminent predecessor, Lord Halifax (then Sir Charles Wood), who at that time presided over the destinies of India, although the bill had not only been introduced into the council, but had actually been passed as a tentative measure for more than six months, intimated his disapproval of the measure. The agitation and the measure, collapsed, and we have never heard one word of the subject since. (Hear, hear.) In conclusion, I will ask your lordship to remember that we as representing the Anglo-Indian community do not for a moment ask that Englishmen or Englishwomen should be set above the law. We do not even ask that any one law or clause should be altered to their advantage. We only ask that the law should remain as it is, and that they should enjoy the privilege upon which, as you have been told, they set so high a value, the privilege of being tried for any criminal offence before one of their own colour, race, and creed. In short, my lord, we can only submit to your lordship's earnest consideration the fact that we represent a large consensus of opinion on the part of the official community in India; that we believe ourselves to be backed by the reasons and the arguments of those high authorities who, on a second consideration of this important measure have, we believe, been led to disapprove of it; and we earnestly entreat you to weigh our arguments in order that the bill should not pass, for we believe it to be one which is not really compatible with the advancement of the best interests of the natives, which will really shake the loyalty and the fidelity of the Anglo-Indian community, and which, in the end, cannot but tend to impair the stability and the permanence of that vast and magnificent dependency over which your lordship so worthily presides. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. J. R. BULLEN-SMITH, C.S.I. (formerly member of the Legislative Council in India): My lord, I feel that so much has been already written and said upon this subject during the last few weeks that anything I could bring forward might almost appear to be a twice told tale; but as having represented till I left India a few years ago very large non-official interests in the Mofussil of Bengal, I cannot refuse the invitation which was addressed to me to join this deputation and say a few words both to manifest my own extreme interest in the subject and the entire approval with which I regard the prayer contained in this memorial, and also to express the opinion which I know is strongly held by those who have succeeded in the management of those interests to which I have referred. My lord, I claim on behalf of those in India who are opposed to this bill, and especially on behalf of my non-official countrymen, that notwithstanding all that is being said now to the contrary, they are reasonable men. I assert, and do it with full confidence, that they are deeply interested in the welfare of India, both for their own sakes and for the sake of its population, and that as a consequence they are deeply interested in its good government in every particular, anxious to advance it by every means in their power, and willing, if necessary, to make some sacrifice on its behalf. I would not wish to make this assertion rashly, but I think in support of it I may very fairly refer to the legislation which took place on this subject in the year 1872. I, in common with my friend Mr. Stewart, whom I see now in this room, had the honour of a seat in the Legislative Council of the Viceroy at the time and were members of the Select Committee which sat on the bill connected with the legislation to which I have referred. He will bear me out in saying that nothing was done then that was hostile; it was a matter which met with the very fullest consideration and although from the very nature of the case, the result which was arrived at could not be officially put forth to the world as being a compromise between different classes of the community and the Government, yet nevertheless, he will support me, I am sure, in saying that it was understood to be a compromise. Mr. Justice Stephen, in a letter which he has lately addressed to the public of India on this subject, has asserted this in the fullest manner, and from the position which he held at the time, as the head of the legislative department in India, his testimony on the subject may be accepted as conclusive. And it is that fact which gives to the present action of the Government, what I am sure was unintentioned, a sort of appearance of breach of faith. It was felt at the time—far be it from me to say a word that would appear to be disgraceful or would seem to imply any such line of conduct—but it was felt at that time that the compromise then made would be held sacred, and would be acted upon until some strong necessity arose for entering upon a new course of action. (Hear, hear.) Let it not, my lord, for a moment be supposed that Englishmen in India held at that time the privilege for which we are now contending a whit less dear than they hold it now. They prized it then just as much as they do now, but they were willing to give up something when a definite reason why was put before them. They were reasonable men and when it was explained to them that the retention of this privilege in all its length and breadth meant practically unpunished crime in the Mofussil, then I say, they were willing to the extent demanded to give up their privilege. Now it seems to me, my lord, that the position now is this: that compromise having been entered into, the natural question is what has occurred during the last ten or eleven years to cause the Government to enter upon a new line of action? I may safely say that up to this time—at any rate, that is my opinion—absolutely nothing has occurred. It seems to me that only two reasons would have justified the Government in referring these subjects. Those would be either that there was some administrative difficulty which rendered it impossible in the existing state of affairs to carry on the government of the country as it ought to be conducted, or that there was some strong demand for a new measure on the part of the inhabitants of India, which it would be impolitic and inexpedient to resist. Now, my lord, with regard to the first of these—the administrative difficulty—it certainly was broached at first in the debate in the Legislative Council, but as far as I can see it very gradually diminished, and at all events I can tell your lordship this: that the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal, speaking with all the weight of his high and responsible position, ruling over the territories in which are to be found more of the class which would be particularly affected by this bill than all the rest of India put together—Mr. Rivers Thompson was able, from his place in the Legislative Council, to say that there existed no administrative difficulty whatever in the territories under his charge, and that assertion he would be prepared to prove whenever it was denied. Then as to the second reason, can it be said that there has been on the part of the Native community a strong demand for this measure? For ten years, from the date which I have spoken of up till last year, when the Civil Procedure Code was passed, I never remember the subject to have been mentioned at all; and is it not a curious thing that we should find in the Legislative Council itself when this subject is brought forward, that the support given to it by Native members is of such a half-hearted and lukewarm description? The Native members in the Council at the time this bill was brought in were two. One of them is well known to myself; he is a shrewd merchant, who has long lived and been respected in Calcutta, and held his own with any and everyone there in his own walks of life; it would have been too much to expect that he should have voted against such a proposition as this; but assuredly, those who read his few remarks will find no great warmth in the assenting vote which he gave. I believe that both he and his colleague, who said that while his head approved of the measure his heart voted against it, would have been far better pleased had the subject never been brought forward. (Hear, hear.) My lord, I cannot too strongly endeavour to impress upon your lordship this fact—that the people of India, as such, those whose opinion is worth having, care nothing about this matter. It seems to them nothing strange whatever that Englishmen should possess this privilege. They see privileges all around them, and not only do they see nothing strange in our possessing this privilege of being tried by one of our own countrymen, but, as I said just now, I never knew a Native yet who would not, if the choice were given him, go before the English gentleman than before the Babu. It therefore comes to this that the course of this new procedure which it is sought to enter upon is to be found in the new perspective disability of a few. This, perhaps, is scarcely the place for me to speak of what I think ought to be the attitude of these few, but I will say this much, that I think that attitude ought not to be the forward one which they are now assuming. I think that looking to the fact that they are now in the civil service at all, a position which ten years ago they could never look forward to, it is hardly becoming of these young gentlemen, in advance of any felt justice, in advance of any actual disability, to endeavour to force the hand of the Government in this matter. It would have been more becoming of them to have waited till the evil was actually felt, and then to have asked for that relief which the whole dealings of the Government which the young gentlemen of Lower Bengal entitled them to believe they would have readily granted. (Hear, hear.) There only remains for me now to mention one other reason which seems to me strongly to show that the status quo of 1872 should be maintained, and that is this, though the large extension of railways, mills, and other works of the kind, we every year import into India a large proportion of mechanics, engineers, artisans of different kinds—the very men upon whom in the Mofussil this Bill will most hardly and severely press. Now, we cannot do without these men; if we wished, we cannot import them as in olden times; their presence is very material, I may say absolutely necessary, to the wealth and material prosperity of India, which we all so much desire. And what I feel strongly is this, that while on the one hand we must take every means to see that their treatment of the Natives is what it should be, we, on the other hand, should not, unless there existed an absolute necessity, drive them to courts in which they have no confidence. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. J. M. MACLEAN (late editor of the Bombay Gazette): My lord, I have been asked to support the prayer of this memorial, because having conducted for a great number of years one of the principal daily papers of India, I have had perhaps exceptional opportunities of becoming familiar with the sentiments of the representatives of English commerce and industry in India—of those men who in the days of the East India Company it was the fashion to speak of as English adventurers. It is generally admitted, I think, that this bill is exceedingly distasteful to this class whom I may call the most valuable element of the population of India. Wherever independent Englishmen settle in that country, whether as merchants, as planters, as professional men, or as skilled merchants, they are a leaven of loyalty, of intelligence, and of fruitful enterprise which leavens the whole inert mass of Indian society. I may say further that this class are as a body remarkably free from crime. The High Court Judges of Allahabad pointed out the other day that during the last ten years not more than 800 cases had occurred in which Europeans were concerned that were brought before all the courts of India, and that of those a very large majority were cases arising in the presidency towns where it is not proposed to make any change in the law. It is therefore clear that this bill will only effect a score or two of cases at the outside in every year which would have to be tried by up-country magistrates and judges, and as it is settled that the proportion of Natives in the Civil Service is not to exceed one-sixth, it is obvious that the chance is very remote indeed of any Native having the privilege of trying a European up-country. This result is of course based on the supposition that crime would not increase, and it shows how infinitesimal and shadowy is the grievance that the Government of India proposes to redress. But what non-official Europeans have too much cause to fear, what they are really alarmed about, is that the number of cases of alleged crime will be fearfully multiplied if this change in the law is carried into effect. As a class, we, non-officials, have never grudged or opposed the advancement of Natives to positions which they are well qualified to fill. We do not do so now. It is not sought to change the law which gives Native magistrates in the Presidency towns full powers to try both Europeans and Natives, but we feel sure that if similar powers are entrusted to Native magistrates up-country the fortunes and the liberties of Englishmen scattered about India will be exposed to terrible peril. (Hear, hear.) We conceive that we have a right to claim the special protection of the Government of India, because we are a small and scattered minority living in the only part of her Majesty's wide dominions in which an independent Englishman is shut out from any hope of ever having a share in the Executive Government of the country. And that which we claim—I don't call it a privilege, but I call it a right—is one the possession of which can give no just cause of offence to any human being. There is only one more point I would like to say a word about. It has been said that the Government of India cannot withdraw this bill for fear of disappointing the Natives; but is it possible for the Government to satisfy the expectations that they have raised if they persevere with this bill? Do we not see from the language of the Native Press that Native agitators will not be satisfied with this bill alone; they regard it, as they say, as only a small instalment of the justice that is due to them, and they will never cease to demand fresh concessions the end of which could only be either to destroy the ascendancy of the English in India, or to compel us (which would be almost equally disastrous) to put forth such efforts to restore our authority as were needed in the crisis of 1857. It is on these grounds that I join in the appeal to your lordship to withhold the consent of Her Majesty's Government to a measure which cannot fail to offend and to injure every Englishman in India, and which holds out no prospect of effectually conciliating the Natives of the country. (Hear, hear.)

Major-General HOPKINSON C.S.I., (late Chief Commissioner of Assam, and Agent-Governor-General North-East Frontier): My Lord, I have been invited to represent Assam and especially the tea interest on this deputation, because, as Mr. Pugh has told you, I once had the honour of being Commissioner of that province. Now, my lord, I have been asked by some of my native friends, in reference to my taking the side of the question represented by the deputation, whether I should not think it very absurd if the Irishmen now in England were to clamour to be tried only by their own countrymen, when charged with the commission of criminal offences, and I have answered, "Yes, without doubt it would be very absurd," but I have added, "Suppose the successful cultivation of some of the most important agricultural products of England depended upon Irish superintendence; that our chief manufacturing industries were managed by Irishmen; that we owed to them the introduction and maintenance of our systems of steam navigation and railways; that we had to thank Irishmen for our code of national education; that we enjoyed through them, for the first time in our history, a tolerable measure of security for our person and our property, protection from anarchy within and from foreign enemies without; and that the continuance of all these benefits depended upon their stay among us, I should then say that we could not do too much to make it acceptable to them, and that even as a mere matter of sentiment, we should be glad to show our gratitude, by conceding to them the privilege of being tried by their own countrymen, if they desired it and much less seek to deprive them of it, if they had long enjoyed it." (Hear, hear.) But, my lord, I am not content to argue against the Ilbert Bill on sentimental grounds; I make to it the very practical objection that it provides for the setting in authority over British European subjects, in remote provinces of India like Assam, as judges and administrators, officers whom I cannot regard as qualified by their ability for such responsible positions. When I say "qualified by their ability," I do not mean the ability to acquire this or that particular science; I do not mean an extraordinary aptitude for mathematics, nor a wonderful gift of tongues, I mean the ability which depends upon the possession of certain moral qualities, which are beyond the reach of competitive examinations to discover but are the most important of all qualities in an administrator. We are taught by history that Englishmen, Irishmen, and Scotchmen, as a rule, do possess these indispensable moral qualities in a very great degree, and so we may assume for any one of them an average share of what is possessed by the mass; and if, therefore, he shows himself superior in those subjects, which can be tested, we may conclude that so far we have the best man when we take him; but I make bold to affirm that history equally teaches that there are races in India which do not possess the indispensable moral qualities I have in view, and it most unfortunately happens that the races that least possess them are the very races who are most nimble witted and apt in the subjects to which the competitive test can be applied. It follows, therefore, that the test which may be fairly adopted for a native of Great Britain will by no means justify the same conclusions when applied to a Native of India. If mere educational or knowledge tests were of universal application to prove universal fitness, we might have "a sweet girl graduate" from Girton appointed on the strength of a successful examination to a seat on the Bench of Metropolitan Magistrates, or sent to take charge of a disturbed district in Ireland. She certainly would not be more out of place there than a Native gentleman from Bengal would be who was appointed to officiate as a deputy commissioner in a frontier district of Assam. For it is from Bengal only that Native members of the Covenanted Civil Service would be likely to be available for employment in Assam, and I should not expect a Native gentleman from Bengal to show much confidence in himself or inspire confidence in others in such a position. If his fears, as Rajah Shiva Prosad says, would prompt him to unjust acquittals, it is certain there would be cases where they would make him convict unjustly; and when both sides were European he would incline to the stronger side. Let it be remembered also that the efficiency of a deputy commissioner or a district magistrate is less severely tested by his judicial capacity than by the discharge of his executive functions where power of will, force of character, tact, temper, and judgment (and for Assam I might fairly add physical courage), are required. It is, I am convinced, quite a mistake to suppose that the planters of Assam are animated by the spirit of what a member of the Indian Council calls "spread-eaglerism" in their opposition to the Ilbert Bill; they do not care whether their rulers and judges are black or white, or where they are born so long as they get even-handed justice and have their public business administered honestly and firmly; and it is the result of their actual experience that makes them doubt whether these would follow under the Ilbert Bill. The enormous cost of European superintendence is one of the greatest hindrances to the profitable cultivation of tea in Assam, and accordingly, in one concern after another, in plantation after plantation, the experiment of Native managers, chosen from the very classes that have furnished successful competitors for the Civil Service, has been tried, and I am assured that no case can be cited in which it has been found to answer. The Native managers have usually proved deficient in the necessary administrative qualifications, and hence the planters have come to the conclusion that if they cannot find Natives who can manage their gardens for them the Government are not likely to be able to find Natives competent to manage them. There are yet a few remarks, my Lord, that with your permission I should like to make on that other provision in the Ilbert Bill, which restricts the Government from appointing European-British subjects to be justices of the peace, and, a fortiori, we may assume that henceforth they will not be appointed Honorary

Magistrates to try Natives, for it would be opposed to the very spirit in which the Bill is conceived to admit such a class distinction. Now, I will not dwell on the sentimental side of the question; that is, the slight implied by the provision that no non-official European, whatever his antecedents, his birth, his education, his social position, nay, possibly, his tried capacity as an administrator in some vast industrial enterprise, shall be deemed eligible to serve on the Commission of the Peace. Here there seems surely a class distinction of the most invidious kind, but I pass that over. My lord, I insist on the impolicy of the restriction, as it will affect the local governments in Assam, Cachar, Darjeeling, and elsewhere by depriving them of an unpaid but material help to the maintenance of law and order. The institution of Honorary Magistrates and Justices of the Peace served that purpose in many ways. It fostered a spirit of loyalty, or at least of goodwill, towards the Government, and a desire to be of service to it. It interested the planters in the administration of the country, and made them more considerate towards the Natives; and for a very trifling expenditure in the way of salaries to clerks, it placed a number of magistrates—the pick of the planting community—at the disposal of Government for employment in parts of the country which practically were not reached by the district magistrates proper, and who were vested with precisely the powers that were required to keep the peace on the tea plantations and make any necessary preliminary investigation in cases of serious crime. I will not further trespass, my lord, on your patience. As a Liberal in politics I fully recognise that our mission to India is to educate the Natives to the management of their own affairs, and fit them to the largest measure of independence and equality; but I think we are a long way yet from the completion of this education, and that in the meanwhile the differences which must exist between the teacher and the taught should be fairly admitted. I object to the Ilbert Bill, inasmuch as it disregards this difference, and that it pretends not only to put the master and pupil on equal terms, but actually to place the rod in the hands of the pupil. (Cheers.)

Colonel MALLESON (late guardian of H.H. the Maharajah of Mysore): My Lord, I think that no stronger argument can be adduced to bear upon any question than the argument of practical experience, and if I should be able to show to your lordship that an experiment very similar to that which has been put forward by the Government of India has been introduced into one of the provinces of India and has failed in that province, there will be good ground for asking the Government of India to abandon such a measure. My lord, I spent seven years in the country of Mysore. When I arrived in that country Mr. Lewin Bowring was the chief commissioner of that province. Mr. Bowring had served with much distinction under very able masters; he had been brought up by Sir Henry and Sir John Lawrence in the Punjab, and had served as private secretary to Lord Canning during the most tumultuous time of that noble lord's career in India. Mr. Bowring was sent by Lord Canning to administer the country of Mysore, and Mr. Bowring, who had at heart the welfare of the Natives as much as any gentleman with whom it has been my good fortune to be associated in India, endeavoured to give them in the province the fullest power of internal administration. Unfortunately Mr. Bowring is not able to be present this afternoon; he is delayed by illness in Torquay; but he has written to me his views on the subject, and with your lordship's permission I will read an extract from his letter. He says:—"I should like to take this opportunity of saying that I have regarded with grave distrust and anxiety the recent measures of the Government of India. . . . There is no disguising the fact that we hold India by the strong hand, and that the time has not come when we can trust to moral force to govern the Natives. I have no faith whatever in their capacity for self-government independently of European control, nor could I place any confidence in Native judges or magistrates who were removed from English superintendence. It is a notable fact that on the rendition of Mysore, although it was a Native State, it was found advisable and necessary to nominate an English officer to the districts where the coffee planters reside, so that the Government of India itself showed a becoming distrust of Native district officers. What I feel regarding the Ilbert Bill and other recent measures of the Government of India is that they tend to unsettle our rule, and to excite hopes in the Native mind which will never be realised in our time. I am sure that no one who had to administer an Indian province was more anxious than I was to advance qualified Natives to high posts, but although the experiment I made in nominating Mr. Krishniengar to be a district officer answered thoroughly, the second Native whom I appointed to a similar post proved a dismal failure. Ability and experience were not wanting, but strict impartiality, combined with that unflinching energy which one finds in Englishmen, was not forthcoming. There are a thousand and one influences at work to deter a Native who wishes to be upright from following a straight forward course—social ties and prejudices, caste fears, religious feelings, and other motives, which hardly present themselves to the mind of the European, but which are all potent to the Native. So much is this the case, that I am almost surprised that any Native official should wish to have jurisdiction over Englishmen. Lord Canning, my old master, had a true insight into the genuine way of maintaining our rule, for he saw that the mass of the people, whose position we had done so much to elevate and improve, were supine or helpless in a time of convulsion, and he learnt that it was to the allegiance of the great chiefs that we must look in case of need. I shall always remember with pleasure the small help that I was able to give him in those days. I happen also to have known Lord Lawrence well, and I am quite sure, from what I saw of him, that anxious as he was to better the condition of the ryots and to protect them from oppression, and desirous as he was to foster municipal action, he would never have dreamt of putting Native officials in a quasi independent position and of giving them authority over Europeans." I trust, my lord, that I shall be pardoned for expressing what are the wishes of one of the most experienced officials and administrators we have ever had in India. (Hear, hear.)

LORD KIMBERLEY'S REPLY.

The Earl of KIMBERLEY: Gentlemen, I have had the advantage of reading the memorial which has been presented to me, for Mr. Pugh was good enough to give me a copy, and I need scarcely say that I shall make a point of transmitting it without delay to Lord Ripon. With regard to the arguments which I have heard, you, no doubt, will remember that upon the occasion of Lord Lytton's motion in the House of Lords, I myself and two of my colleagues stated very fully the arguments which had induced the Government to arrive at a conclusion favourable to the measure which you have referred to to-day. I think it would be quite unnecessary and, indeed, probably unwise that I should now repeat those arguments. I confess that my natural instinct for debate makes me a little tempted to deal with some of the remarks that I have heard to-day, but there are only two that I will allude to, because I do not think the matter is likely to be advanced by controversial argument. There are only two; one is that I was rather pained to hear Sir Alexander Arbuthnot bring forward as an argument the occurrence of two or three acts of violence on the part of Natives at Calcutta. I cannot see that the commission of brutal crimes, which are committed by white men in other countries as well as by Natives, can affect the character of such Native gentlemen as are at all likely to exercise jurisdiction under this Bill, and I should be rather disposed to reply to such an argument by the observation that was used by another gentleman—namely, that because certain Irishmen have unfortunately committed some grievous agrarian crimes, therefore no Irishman is fitted to sit upon the Judicial Bench in Ireland to deal with crime in that country. One other remark I should like to make is this. We have just heard an interesting letter read from Mr. Bowring, who has had experience in Mysore, and I was curious to know what was the principle or the argument which he could suggest, as showing by his experience that the committal of magisterial powers to Natives had proved a failure, and would be likely to prove a failure. But the only thing that I gathered was this—that he had had experience of two magistrates. One of them, he said, had been a success, and the other had turned out to be a failure. Now, I have unfortunately had to deal with a great many public officers in my time, and I am sorry to say that out of a certain number of gentlemen—Europeans—there are some who have proved failures in the offices they have held, and in some particular or other have not realised the expectations formed with regard to them. I confess, I think it is scarcely possible to argue to the exclusion of the whole body of Natives in some particular jurisdiction. However, I will not pursue the argument any further. I am very glad, indeed, that you have afforded me this opportunity of stating that Her Majesty's Government adhere entirely to their approval of the principle of the Bill as stated in Lord Hartington's despatch of December last, and that they have not the slightest intention of instructing the Government of India to withdraw the Bill. You know of course—indeed it has been referred to by some speakers—that Lord Ripon has referred the Bill, which was laid before the Legislative Council, to the Local Government Committees and to some other local bodies. He has not yet received the whole of the reports which are expected to be returned from those Governments and bodies. When they are received I have no doubt that in transmitting them to this country he will express the opinion of the Government of India upon the subject, and it may be very possible that the Government of India may come to the conclusion that it is desirable to introduce certain modifications into the Bill as brought before the Legislative Council, not inconsistent with its general principle. I am sure, however, the deputation will not expect me to allude in any way now to any particular points upon which the Bill might possibly be modified, because it would be very wrong on my part to express an opinion before I know the views of the Government of India and also the opinions that have been expressed by the Local Governments on those various details. I hope that the deputation who have brought this matter very fully before me will not think that I am giving them a curt answer. I do not in the least desire to do so. I am very sensible, indeed, of the weight and importance of the deputation that has waited upon me. I find nothing whatsoever in this memorial which I have the smallest reason to complain of. The views of the memorialists, as far as I can gather, are stated in clear, plain, forcible, and very temperate language; and it is a distinct advantage to the Government that where there is a large body of gentlemen who, although I may not agree with them, entertain very strong views upon a question of importance of this kind, they should lay those views before the Government, and give us a full and ample opportunity of considering them with reference to the subject before us.

Mr. PUGH: I have only, on the part of the deputation, to thank your lordship for having received the deputation, and also to thank you for the careful and considerate way in which you have dealt with the matter.

The deputation then withdrew.

APPEAL TO THE PEOPLE OF ENGLAND FROM THE ENGLISHWOMEN OF INDIA.

LORD RIPON, the present Viceroy of India, proposes to subject all the Englishwomen resident in India to the Criminal Jurisdiction of Native Magistrates. These Englishwomen, most of whom belong to the poorer classes, accompany their husbands, fathers, or brothers, to India as a matter of sacred domestic duty. The Natives of India, however excellent their character in many respects, are avowedly polygamists. They shut up their ladies in the strictest seclusion; and no Native Magistrate would on any account allow his own wife or daughter to be looked on, either in court or elsewhere, by any male stranger. It is an absolutely undeniable fact that the position of the female sex in the social system of India is, and must long remain, altogether different from that which it occupies in Europe, and especially in the United Kingdom. Nearly all the Englishwomen in India, to the number of 5,758, have signed the following petition to Her Gracious Majesty the Queen; and the greatest terror on the subject is everywhere manifested by them. They appeal to the GENEROUS PEOPLE OF ENGLAND to join them in their petition to Her Majesty:—

THE PETITION OF THE ENGLISHWOMEN OF INDIA AGAINST THE ILBERT BILL.

THE HUMBLE PETITION OF THE UNDERSIGNED EUROPEAN BRITISH SUBJECTS, BEING WOMEN RESIDING IN INDIA, TO HER MOST GRACIOUS MAJESTY, VICTORIA, QUEEN OF GREAT BRITAIN AND EMPRESS OF INDIA.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR MOST GRACIOUS MAJESTY,

Having learnt that a Bill has been introduced into the Legislative Council of the Governor-General of India to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure of 1882, by altering the existing law, so as to confer on Native Magistrates of certain classes jurisdiction to try European British subjects in the interior of India on Criminal charges, and knowing the tender care and interest Your Majesty ever bestows upon your subjects in all parts of your dominions, we beg most humbly to approach Your Majesty, to express the grave alarm with which we contemplate the proposed change and to crave Your Majesty's intervention to protect us from the serious injury we believe it must cause to our welfare and happiness.

In thus craving Your Most Gracious Majesty's protection we will forbear to enlarge on the many and cogent arguments against the said Bill, as affecting our countrymen in common with ourselves, being aware that such arguments have been ably set forth by our countrymen in India and England, and will confine ourselves to those particulars in which it specially affects women who are European British subjects, in India.

First, then, we would humbly submit that the position held by women in Native society is so entirely different from that held by their European sisters, and this difference so deeply affects all the relations of social and domestic life, and the customs, habits and feelings connected with those relations, that no Native of India, however highly educated, can possess the knowledge or sympathy, essential to a correct appreciation of the feelings and conduct of European women. But such a correct appreciation of the feelings and conduct of accused persons can alone qualify a judge to try them; and consequently the effect of the proposed change in the law would be to transfer the trial of European women in India to men who, by the force of circumstances, are incompetent to do them justice.

The civilising effect of a residence in England on Natives of India has been put forward as an argument in favour of the harmlessness of the proposed change. But this argument is inapplicable to the circumstances of the case, and, if it were applicable, would have very little force. For, in the first place, the bill proposes to give jurisdiction over European British subjects not only to Covenanted Native Civilians, who have been to England, but to Native Statutory Civilians, Native Assistant Commissioners and others, who have never left India, and have often had nothing worthy of the name of an English education; and, in the second place, experience has shown us that the effect of a residence in England on the character and feelings of Natives of India is far from being generally such as to inspire us with confidence in their competence to try us.

Apart from the terrible risk of injustice to which European women would thus be subjected in cases in which they themselves might have the misfortune to be accused, their examination as witnesses in cases in which their countrymen might be accused, before Native Magistrates, would, owing to the great difference of modes of life, habits, and ideas already described, be in the highest degree hurtful to their feelings and repugnant to their sense of propriety, and this injurious consequence would be greatly aggravated by the fact that, in the majority of cases, the pleaders to whose cross-examination they would be exposed, would also be Natives of India.

A further ground on which we implore Your Most Gracious Majesty's intervention is that, in the opinion of the Natives of India, it is highly disgraceful for women of respectability to appear before a stranger of the opposite sex, particularly in a Criminal Court; and this is a feeling so deeply ingrained in their minds that no amount of education and no residence in Europe can wholly disabuse them of it. The Native magistrate before whom a European woman could be brought for trial would consequently be unavoidably prejudiced against her, and she would thus be placed not only in a false position, but at an unfair disadvantage.

Moreover, the British Government in India, having so far lent its sanction to this feeling as to exempt Native women of respectability from appearing openly in Court, the fact of our being compelled to appear before the very men who claim and enjoy this exemption for their own women, would inevitably give rise, in the minds of ignorant people of the country, to comparisons prejudicial to the esteem in which we are held, and without which esteem our position in the midst of an alien and unsympathetic population would be intolerable.

Further, we would urge on Your Most Gracious Majesty's consideration the fact that, owing to the low estimate in which the Natives of India hold the female sex, it would be imposing a special indignity on us, and inflicting a cruel wound on our self-respect, to subject us to trial by Native Magistrates.

Nor would the evil thus resulting be confined to this unnecessary and unbearable injury to our feelings. For the knowledge of the injury and of the dread with which we should regard it, would operate as a powerful incentive to any ill-disposed Natives to resort to false charges against us for the purposes of extortion, intimidation, and revenge; and this temptation would be increased by a belief in our helplessness before an alien tribunal, isolated, as we should in many cases be, from our natural protectors; unable, as we should be in the great majority of cases, to obtain the assistance of European counsel, and ignorant, as we should generally be, of the language in which the proceedings would be conducted.

In the case of the poorer class of Europeans residing in the interior of the country, the danger arising from this cause would be of a most serious character and would destroy their sense of security and embitter their relations with the Natives around them to an extent which would be likely to prove a fruitful source of trouble.

So far we have confined ourselves to the respects in which the passing of the proposed Bill would result in grievous wrong and injury to ourselves. But we would also urge, as a matter well deserving of Your Most Gracious Majesty's careful consideration, that, by the degradation it would inflict on us in the eyes of the Natives of this country, it would go far to deprive us of that influence for good on which the enlightenment and amelioration of the condition of our Native sisters so largely depend, and which we believe to be an object of Your Majesty's anxious solicitude to promote.

We might say much more, but we feel we have said enough to justify our humble prayer that Your Most Gracious Majesty will be pleased to use your constitutional power for the protection of your petitioners in such manner as to Your Majesty may seem fit.

And Your Majesty's humble petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

TELEGRAM."

We have studiously refrained of late from taking part in the wearisome discussion of the "garbled telegram." But the papers received by the last mail necessitate our returning to it. The St. James's Gazette whose remarks we republish, criticises the affair with decent fairness for a party organ; but the Pall Mall has contrived to give us about as many misstatements as it has lines. The readers of the Pioneer know the facts of the case already, and these facts differ toto calo from the "facts" of the Pall Mall. In the first place, the report of the debate was not sent "openly;" it was sent without the knowledge of the majority of the Council; it was sent through Reuter, in the form of an ordinary press message, and not as a communiqué, and the circumstance of its transmission was only known to some half-dozen people, the Viceroy included, until the home correspondent of an Indian paper drew attention to its appearance in the Standard. Secondly the Government did not "send this abstract just as they habitually send a similar abstract of the Budget Statement." That statement is an avowed and accepted official statement of a matter not in controversy, which by no possible twisting of definitions can be said of the Native Jurisdiction Bill. Thirdly, the version given of the Viceroy's speech was not a correct "exposition of the character and effect of the Bill;" on the contrary, it contained a gross blunder which vitiated the entire argument—a blunder pointed out in these columns on April 20 last, and subsequently admitted by the Government in the authorised report of the debate published in the Gazette. Fourthly, "all the other speeches" were "greatly," but were not "impartially curtailed," for some of the most important in opposition were omitted altogether. We impute no dishonourable motives to the Government in the matter, nor ever have; so far we sympathise with their audacious defender of the Pall Mall. We only reiterate, let us devoutly trust for the last time, that the affair was ill-judged worse managed, and much to be deplored.

ALLEN'S INDIAN MAIL.

TUESDAY, AUGUST 7, 1883.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

Our advices by the overland mail are, from Bombay, July 10; Madras and Allahabad, July 9; Calcutta, July 7. We have also received, by way of Venice, papers of a week's later date.

TO-DAY we have the unusual pleasure of presenting to our readers two week's Indian Mail in one issue. The arrival of one mail via Plymouth, on a Bank holiday, has been followed, the very next day, by the succeeding mail via Venice.

THE London correspondent of the Manchester Courier of August 1 makes an interesting disclosure in regard to the way in which supporters are obtained for Lord Ripon's policy of persecuting Englishmen and Englishwomen in order to flatter the baser feelings of a very small body of Natives. He writes:—

"The advocates of Lord Ripon's sentimental policy are making the most strenuous endeavours to enlist men of mark. When one of these lately declined to attend the meeting at Willis's Rooms, it was suggested to him that he might possibly see his way to write a sympathetic letter, and when that proposal too was declined he was urged to maintain a neutral attitude on the plea that the other side were strong enough already."

WE have this week another development of Lord Ripon's Afghan policy. Of late the world has been so lost in admiration at the domestic achievements of Mr. Gladstone's "best of all possible Viceroys," that it has somewhat lost sight of the equally glorious results that are being obtained in foreign affairs. Barring some rare episodes of exceptional interest—as when the Amir made a pyramid of the heads of the Shinwaris, or when our own outposts were attacked and their sentries murdered, or when we were called upon to pay a new subsidy of £120,000—we have been content to guess vaguely at what might be happening on the other side of the Afghan frontier. Now, however, we get at last a crumb of intelligence from Kabul; and Lord Ripon is doubtless glad to find that things are no worse than they were just before Lord Lytton turned the Russian Embassy neck-and-crop out of Afghanistan. The Times says, in its most authoritative tone:—

"Information has reached the Indian authorities from a sure source that a Russian is at present resident at Cabul. Although Russian subjects, such as Bokharans, and natives of Khokand, are known to have visited Cabul after the war, this is the first time that a European has reached the capital of Afghanistan since our evacuation of the country."

RUMOURS—reminding one of the famous Reuter's telegram—have been diligently circulated by the Indian Government from time to time during the past few months, that the Amir was very anxious to come to India this autumn to pay his respects to the great and successful Viceroy, Lord Ripon. And this latest information looks very like it.

Of course, the haste with which Lord Ripon sent off the additional black-mail to Kabul the other day had nothing to do with the presence of the Russian emissary at the Amir's Court.

THE Times correspondent at Calcutta telegraphs a most interesting summary of the opinions of some of the local authorities on the Ilbert Bill. But Mr. Bright has already warned us that these opinions will be worthy of nothing but contempt.

SIR ALFRED LYALL has invented an ingenious way of letting Lord Ripon down easy. He calculates that Native Civilians can all be provided for in the Judicial line; so he recommends that the Ilbert Bill jurisdiction shall only be conferred on "Natives who may be appointed to the office of Magistrate of a district." To such miserable shifts are we reduced by the necessity of minimising the blunders of an incompetent Viceroy!

THE Chief Commissioner of Assam follows exactly the manly line taken by the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal in the debate of March last—that the Government ought not to be ashamed of admitting "that a step in advance had been taken too soon." Lord Ripon will yet learn, we hope before it is too late, that honesty is the best policy. If Mr. Rivers Thompson's honest advice had been frankly accepted when it was offered, what a world of trouble and disaster would have been avoided!

THE Lieutenant Governor of the Punjab offers a nostrum for Lord Ripon's malady that he thinks would have somewhat the same effect as that contemplated by the Lieutenant Governor of the North-West; he would impose "long and severe tests" on Native aspirants for the privilege of trying European British subjects. Sir Charles Aitchison has, however, put himself out of court with the Bright party; for he is actually knave or fool enough to say that the fears of the Ilbert Bill expressed by Europeans should "command the deepest respect."

MR. LAL MOHUN GHOSE will have to turn his attention to "Mahomed Noor Khan, pensioner, late Rissaldar 7th Bengal Cavalry." This irreverent Hindustani officer writes to the Pioneer that no race wishes for the Ilbert Bill except "the obese and feeble Bengalis." This is flat blasphemy, and Mr. Bright ought to be told of it.

BEWARE of "mixed" telegrams. The Bombay Gazette makes an amusing admission in regard to the famous "cooked telegram" that appeared in the English Press as a "Reuter," having been revised and corrected by Major Baring, and paid for by the Viceroy out of the public revenue. The Gazette says:—

"We may here add that it would scarcely have been in the power of Reuter's London office to omit the proper label in sending out the statement in question to the newspapers, if the Press Commissioner was now, as he was under Lord Lytton's Government, a functionary of flesh and blood, performing his special functions in his own person. When the Press Commissionership was put very literally in commission, to Reuter was assigned the duty of transmitting long or important communications to the London Press, and sometimes to that of India. It is awkward, certainly, when the official information thus entrusted to Baron Reuter's agents gets 'mixed' with their own."

THE Madras opinions on the Ilbert Bill had been received at Simla before the mail left. The Madras Government, to quote the Viceroy's speech in Council, were on the first occasion "divided among themselves, and the opinion given in favour of the bill was only decided by the casting vote of the Governor of that Presidency;" the fact being that Mr. Carmichael and Mr. Huddleston condemned Mr. Ilbert's proposals as "impolitic and not expedient," while the Governor himself and Sir Frederick Roberts considered it was a pity a question was raised which affected so few people, but that logically and in equity no difference could be made between English and Native Covenanted Civilians. In the despatch which has just reached Simla the Madras opinions, the Allahabad paper hears, are on the old lines; but Sir Frederick Roberts has added a minute pointing out the original mistake which was made when natives were allowed to enter the Covenanted Civil Service, and urging that in future all appointments of natives should be solely by nomination."

Now that the opinions of the Local Governments on the Ilbert Bill are (we speak of the week preceding the departure of the Bombay Mail of July 17) coming in, Lord Ripon seems to be getting rather uneasy about them. The Bombay Gazette of July 17 says:—

"Attention is called by the Statesman to an assertion in the Calcutta Review regarding the position of the Government in the matter of the Jurisdiction Bill, that 'the Government has called for certain opinions and promised to abide by them.' The Statesman says:—'We challenge any one to produce the promise, or to prove that it was ever made. We are of opinion that the statement that the Government 'staked the question on the result of an appeal to official opinion,' that it 'called for certain opinions, and promised to abide by them,' is not true. But if it is true, it can easily be proved, for the promise must have been expressed in words, and the words can be quoted. The only promise of which we are aware was made in the following words by the Viceroy:—'We shall then give to the observations of the Local Governments and of the public which may have reached us in the meantime, the fullest weight and the most deliberate consideration.' But if a man asks for opinions, and promises to weigh and deliberate upon them, does he bind himself to abide by them?'

THE Anjuman-i-Punjab remarks:—

"The passing of the Ilbert Bill will not affect British prestige or British influence one jot, though it will annoy the bulk of the European community for no very great compensating gain. The withdrawal of the measure, on the other hand, will not shake British power in the very least. The people of this country have too much confidence in their rulers and in their own obligations to them to be violently agitated at the fate of such a measure. The bulk of the people care for none of these things, they want good government and no sensational legislation. So long as they are not misruled by their district officers, and so long as they get justice, they will be satisfied."

We are glad to reproduce the following from the Englishman of July 7:—

"With reference to the statement that Mr. Primrose was the author of the 'garbled' telegram, it has been pointed out to us that as that gentleman was ill at the time, he can hardly have had any hand in the discreditable business. Though, therefore, our informant speaks very positively on the subject, we are disposed to think he must have been misled."

THE Englishman writes:—

"The latest development of the policy of deception, or, as the Daily Telegraph euphemistically calls it, 'reservation,' which has from the outset marked the action of the Government in connection with the Native Jurisdiction Bill, has been a systematic attempt to persuade the Secretary of State and the public at home that the opposition to the Bill in this country was confined to a few officials and had completely died out. The particular form assumed by this splendidly audacious 'reservation' affords a sufficient indication of its origin. Lord Ripon's laudable determination that India should not be 'ruled by Calcutta lawyers' will, no doubt, be fresh in the memories of most readers of the Englishman. When, therefore, we hear of one of Lord Ripon's intimate advisers, at present on leave in London, assuring Lord Kimberley that the agitation in Bengal had its origin with a knot of Calcutta lawyers, the inference is but natural that this new 'fly' was prepared in the same manufactory as the 'cooked telegram,' and the equally ingenious report to the Secretary of State."

"The most convincing answer that could be given to it is to be found below in the names of the three hundred and odd Anglo-Indians in England who signed the requisition for the great meeting, held on the 25th ult., at St. James's Hall, to protest against the Bill. The list speaks for itself so plainly that it seems almost superfluous to point out that the majority of the names are those of officials and ex-officials, and that they represent all ranks of every branch of the public service."

"The dishonesty of this last desperate attempt to gull the public at home into the belief that it is only unscrupulous lawyers hungering after briefs, and raw-boned planters thirsting after the blood of the Bengali rayat, who disapprove of Lord Ripon's righteous and patriotic policy and peculiarly English tactics, was in any case destined to eventual detection. For nothing short of suppression of the reports of the local officials on the Bill could have prevented its becoming sooner or later publicly known that nine out of ten, if not a much larger majority, of them, had condemned it in the most unqualified terms. But in the meantime much mischief might have been done to the cause of truth, as was done momentarily by the 'cooked telegram.'"

"On the whole, we have good reason to be grateful both to the originators of this last 'reservation' and to the gentleman who has been mainly instrumental in endeavouring to palm it off on an embarrassed Secretary of State and a credulous public. A few more similar exposures, and these over-sharp machinators will have only one resource left, viz., to say the opposite of what they wished to have believed."

THE Indian Daily News says:—

"Letters from Simla show a state of things which would go a long way to prove that the work of the administration has been seriously affected by Lord Ripon's philanthropy. There are rumours of friction between the Viceroy and the Members of the Government, and of despatches from home of a querulous, if not positively fault-finding, nature. The Viceroy is said to exhibit considerable obstinacy in his opinions, and to be difficult of approach. There can be no doubt that his lordship has felt the severe strain of the past few months; and if he could take a holiday, it would, perhaps, be equally well for his own health and for the disposal of the many great questions which are returning upon his hands."

THE Englishman says:—

"The following thinly veiled threat is translated from the Ananda Bazar Patrika of the 18th ultimo. That such sentiments appeal to the sympathy of the better class of the native community, we cannot for a moment believe, but it is a matter of sufficiently grave significance that they should be held by any class of that community, still more that they should find expression in the columns of a public journal. If the warning contained in our article of Tuesday last needed any further justification than the occurrences which called it forth, the justification would be found in the circulation of such incitements as that to which we are referring."

"Recently a Mehter attacked a respectable English lady with a view to violate her chastity. This occurrence took place in Calcutta and at a place where many Englishmen of position reside. The husband brought a charge against the Mehter in the Criminal Court, but has subsequently withdrawn the charge, probably through shame and fear of opprobrium. The news of this occurrence has filled many with sorrow and surprise. Before this, even the highest personages of this country were afraid to touch the shadow of an Englishman, and now a Mehter, who cannot even be touched, has subjected a respectable lady of the English nationality to degrading treatment. Nothing can be a subject of greater regret than this. But if Englishmen go on getting lowered in this way they cannot blame others for it. If they are lowered in this way, they will be themselves to blame for it. Thirty years ago the indigo planters, to satisfy their morbid thirst for money, rendered the name of Englishmen hateful all over this country. Through the efforts of English Government officials, the name of Englishmen gradually became again an object of reverence to the people of this country. But having gone mad over the Jurisdiction Bill, Englishmen have again forgotten their true interests. They will gradually come to find out the extent of injury they have done to themselves over this Jurisdiction Bill."

THE Times of India writes:—

"The argument that loyalty demands that the European community should submit to a compromise in order to save the reputation or the prestige of Government of India by preventing the humiliation of open defeat, is easily disposed of. In the first place is not some consideration due to the loyal subjects? Are we to hear only of the prestige of the Government when the influence for good and the administrative authority of a few scattered Europeans in this vast Empire depend to so great a degree upon the reverence for personal authority which we see around us? When the services of the handful of Europeans in this country can be dispensed with, it will be time to consider whether the European can be made unnecessarily cheap with impunity. Do the authors of the argument suppose that the fate of the Empire depends on the result of a debate in a Legislative Council? If there is any force in the argument, the Mhowra Bill ought never to have been vetoed by the Viceroy. Nay, Legislative Councils should be at once abolished, and the Viceroy should be an autocrat in regard to the making of our laws as well as in purely executive matters. Least of all can a Viceroy, pledged to support Liberal principles, tolerate the suggestion that the Bill or compromise should be forced through the most important council in India by sheer weight of dominant official influence. The fact is that though the armour propre of the author of the Bill may be wounded by defeat, the prestige of the Government of India will suffer all the less by a courageous admission of error. The loyalty of European classes requires no proof, and the loyalty which would yield a half-hearted support to a measure believed to be fraught with danger can be only of a meretricious sort."

When Surgeon General Hunter was selected to go to Egypt the other day, it was currently reported at 14, St. James's that a curious and unique affection for the Ilbert Bill had recommended that distinguished medical officer to the notice of the authorities; and a rush was anticipated to the Ilbert Bill meeting held under the auspices of the Secretary to the Aborigines Protection Society. The rush, however, did not come off—as anyone personally acquainted with the personnel of the Indian Army Medical Department could easily have predicted beforehand. The gallant Dr. Hunter still remains unique, we believe; and a contemporary has started another and still more curious theory as to the method employed by Government in the difficult and responsible task of selecting Egyptian cholera-wallahs. Our contemporary writes:—

"It is said that an advertisement, which appeared in some of the newspapers, to the effect that 'medical men in reduced circumstances may hear of something to their advantage by applying to,' &c., emanated from the Foreign Office, and that it was from applicants of this class that the British medical officers who have been despatched to Egypt were chosen."

AN instance of the way in which the Local Self-Government Bill is likely to affect the power of municipalities to raise loans for local purposes is given by the Civil and Military Gazette. It appears that the Bank of Bengal recently offered to advance to the Municipality of Delhi the loan of fifteen lakhs, required for the proposed waterworks, on terms which were considered satisfactory. A correspondent now informs our contemporary that the bank has withdrawn the offer; and that its reason for doing so is the effect which the Local Self-Government scheme is likely to have in unsettling security.

A TELEGRAM received through Reuter's Agency from Bcmday, dated August 3, says:—

"Owing to the present difficulties as to quarantine in Egypt and at Continental ports, Her Majesty's Postmaster-General has suspended the conveyance of the outward and homeward India, China, and Australian mails by the Egyptian Railway, and has sanctioned their conveyance by the Suez Canal route. Accordingly passengers proceeding to the East from Brindisi or Venice, will connect with the company's trunk services to India, China, and Australia at Port Said, and will proceed through the Suez Canal, thus avoiding contact with Egypt. Once a fortnight passengers for Bombay will be conveyed from Venice and Brindisi via the Suez Canal direct, and without change of steamer. The difficulties of quarantine, so far as passengers are concerned, outwards, will thus be overcome."

MR. JOUBERT thinks the Calcutta Exhibition will "rank first in the list of similar undertakings in the East." The Times correspondent telegraphs some interesting remarks on the progress of the enterprise to date.

For a "nice derangement of epitaphs," the following extract from a native contemporary is fairly successful:—"India cannot be governed despotically for ever, though a few Anglo-Indian editors may break their heads against the fly-wheel, and persuade the powers that be to the contrary."

How to carry about writing-ink safely and conveniently, without danger of leakage or breaking of bottles has always been a question of considerable importance and difficulty to travellers, especially in a hot climate like that of India. The problem has at last been satisfactorily solved, by the invention of the "Electric" solid or portable writing-ink in crystals. A little penny box of these crystals—which can be obtained in any colour, and for either writing or re-copying—is sufficient for many "brews" of ink; and to brew the ink, you have only to take a tablespoonful of water, and put a pinch of the crystals in it.

THE Englishman gives the following account of the Calcutta Freight Market for the week ending July 7:—

"Our Freight Market has been again weak and declining, and rates may be said to be fully half-a-crown lower than they were last week. The principal demand is still for grain and seeds by Canal, but the lower rates by Cape have resulted in the fixing of three ships for London, one for Liverpool, one for New York, and one for San Francisco. Our unfixed tonnage amounts to 32,000 tons."

AND for the week ending July 14 our contemporary reports as follows:—

"Again another week of comparative inactivity. For a short while it seemed as if rates would have to give way further but towards the close a slightly better demand has sprung up leaving quotations much as they were. This demand is still principally for Canal tonnage, sailors being almost entirely neglected, even at the present low quotations ruling in our market. Only two vessels have found employment during the week, viz., one for Liverpool and one for Mauritius. Our unfixed tonnage stands at 36,552 tons.

MESSRS. W. MORAN AND Co. give the following report on the Calcutta Tea Market, for the week ending July 14:—

"Auctions were held on the 5th and 12th instant, at which 13,461 chests were sold, the total quantity offered being 14,302 chests. On the 5th there was but little demand, and the sales passed off flatly. On the 12th there was more animation, and prices showed a slight recovery. A few invoices of specially good quality from Assam and Darjeeling sold freely at full rates."

MESSRS. W. MORAN & Co.'s Market Report has the following on Indigo prospects, for the week ending July 14:—

"The advices received from Behar since our last issue have not been so favourable as we could wish; there has been very little rain, and the plant has not grown so well as it should have done, and is scarcely ripe for manufacture, which is consequently a good deal later than was expected, and even yet a good many factories have hardly commenced; so far the yield from the plant has only been middling, except at some factories in Champaran that opened last month. Letters received this morning say that an improvement in the yield is now taking place; but, on the whole, we do not consider prospects to be so good as they were a fortnight back. From Lower Bengal there is nothing favourable to report. Midnapore and Moorshedabad have the best promise at present, and hope to do as well as last year; but it seems likely that Kishnaghur and Jessore will fall short of last year's outturn, and the reports from Purneah and Bhagulpore, more especially the latter, could hardly be much worse. Altogether the total outturn from Lower Bengal is likely to be a good deal under that of last season. In the Benares Provinces and the Doab the rainfall has been exceedingly light, and we hear a good many complaints of drought and the plant burning; but, unless there is too much rain later on, we think the season in this quarter bids fair to be a successful one."

THE Times of India gives the following obituary for the week ending July 10:—

"Mr. Anderson Souttar, barrister-at-law, of the Calcutta bar; Lieut. Percy Frith Reid, 2-11th (Devonshire) Regiment; Lieut. Col. A. Joliffe Tufnell, late Border Regiment; Mr. W. H. Floyd, Telegraph Superintendent, G. I. P. Railway."

WE take from the Bombay Gazette the following obituary for the week ending July 17:—Colonel S. Parry, commanding Rawal Pindi, died at Murree; Colonel Drever, C.S.I., Commissioner of Police, Madras; James Melville, Commander of the B. I. S. N. Co's steamer Bhundara, Calcutta; Mr. Donald Steel, planter, of Cachar, at Ceylon.

WE take the following Indian Tea and Weather Report from Messrs. Balmer, Lawrie, and Co's., Circular, July 7:—

"Our last report was dated 23rd June. For the past fortnight the weather in the tea-growing districts has, on the whole, been satisfactory. On the whole there still seems to be a general want of rain, though some gardens are picking up for the time lost, most are still considerably behind last year. All those connected with Indian Tea will learn with pleasure that the Indian Tea Association have gained the concessions respecting the weighing of tea in bond, that it has been so long striving for; the Association is to be heartily congratulated on the satisfactory result of its efforts, and it only rests with the Planters now to make the new system one of practical advantage. Assam.—Dibrugarh.—Prospects are improving in this locality, rain having fallen more or less daily; the Brahmaputra overflowed its banks at some points, but fortunately the waters soon subsided, and caused little damage. The plants were flushing nicely and beginning to lose the charred look they have had for some time; but the chilly nights complained of still by a few managers retard the rapid progress that the gardens should be making; there is slight indications of Thrips, and red spider and blight are on some gardens.—Jajpur.—The gardens here are doing well in tea, and some are ahead of last year in outturn.—Bibsagar.—The weather has been favourable for growth in this part lately, a moderate amount of rain being accompanied with sun heat. Blight is disappearing and good flushes are coming out, so that gardens that are greatly behind last year, have a chance now of picking up a little.—Jorhat.—Hot and dry weather still prevails in this part, with only occasional showers that do but little good; leaf is thin and outturn very deficient.—Lakhimpore.—The weather here continues favourable, and fair flushes of leaf have come out; red spider and green fly seem less vigorous, probably owing to the prevalent damp heat; on three mornings there was an unusual fog noticeable. Most gardens are much behind in outturn.—Mungledie.—The regular rains have not yet set in, and the weather is very hot; red spider is bad everywhere which shows there is no growth in the bushes. Unless the regular rains set in soon, prospects will be gloomy, and the manufacture will probably fall short of the estimates.—Gowhati.—The weather is too cool still to be seasonable and prevents heavy flushes; most gardens will not be able to make up for the quantity lost at the beginning of the season.—Cachar.—Good growing weather has favoured most parts of this district, but on some estates constant rain has impeded the progress of manufacture; blight is very bad in all parts of the district.—South-West Sylhet.—The rainfall has been inadequate and the weather cloudy and cold; leaf which had been coming on well, was very much checked by these unfavourable conditions on 29th ultimo; however, a change set in and  $2\frac{1}{2}$  inches of rain fell in one night.—Darjeeling.—Since the heavy rain reported in our last, this district has had favourable weather for tea, but a good deal of sickness is prevalent, and cholera has appeared causing much anxiety. The temperature has been very changeable, the thermometer being sometimes as low as 62 deg. in the day; the mornings have been mostly warm and sunny, followed by cloudy afternoons. A peculiarity in the leaf produced lately on some gardens is a long piece of stalk between each leaf, which may be the result of recent unfavourable weather. From the Dooars we hear that the weather lately has been showery, and everyone very busy trying to get off their flushes before they are too matured; the late continued rains had brought such a heavy show of leaf.—Kumaon.—The monsoon seems to have burst over this district on 29th ultimo, about a fortnight later than usual. Many gardens are so far behind last year in outturn that there is little chance now of them picking up, for the previous rain had come down in heavy, but very partial showers.—Kangra Valley.—In this district the monsoon burst on 26th ultimo, and the flushes have since run out very well, so the outturn is equal to last year on some gardens; the quality of tea also is better than the average.—Chittagong.—The rainfall has now far exceeded last year, three quarters of the average of the year having been already registered in the northern part of the district; sunshine would be very welcome, manufacture still being behind and impeded by the rains.—THE MARKETS.—Australia. The latest despatches are dated June 4th, and advise two public sales of Indian tea in Melbourne, since our last report; the first on May 22nd, consisted of Kangra Valley and Darjeeling Pekoes and Souchongs in 1lb. packets, and  $\frac{1}{2}$  and  $\frac{1}{4}$  chests; the second, on 29th idem, at which 4,730 packages were disposed of. The following rates were realised:—Assam Pekoe,  $8\frac{1}{2}$ d. to 1s. 7d.; Pekoe Souchong,  $6\frac{1}{2}$ d. to  $10\frac{1}{4}$ d.; Souchong,  $7\frac{1}{2}$ d. to  $8\frac{3}{4}$ d.; Broken Pekoe,  $11\frac{3}{4}$ d. to 1s.  $1\frac{1}{4}$ d.; Broken Pekoe, Souchong,  $7\frac{1}{2}$ d. to  $8\frac{1}{2}$ d.; Broken Tea,  $7\frac{1}{2}$ d. to  $8\frac{1}{4}$ d.; Cachar Pekoe, 1s. to 1s. 4d.; Pekoe Souchong,  $7\frac{1}{2}$ d. to 10d.; Broken Pekoe Souchong,  $8\frac{1}{4}$ d.; Souchong, 7d. to 9d.; Darjeeling Pekoe Souchong,  $9\frac{1}{2}$ d. to 10d.; Dooars Broken Tea,  $7\frac{1}{2}$ d.; Dehra Doon Broken Pekoe,  $9\frac{1}{2}$ d.; Pekoe,  $10\frac{1}{2}$ d.; Orange Pekoe,  $8\frac{1}{4}$ d.; Kumaon Pekoe Souchong, 8d. to  $10\frac{1}{4}$ d.; Chittagong Pekoe Souchong,  $8\frac{1}{2}$ d. to 10d. Calcutta.—At the public sales of 5th instant 4,470 chests were offered and 3,958 sold; prices were without change; the quality generally was not up to previous sales.”

THE WEATHER AND THE CROPS.

THE following is the official summary of the report of the Revenue and Agricultural Department on the state of the weather and condition of the crops throughout India, for the week ended June 26:—

“Rain has fallen during the past week all over the Madras Presidency, but except along the Malabar Coast and in Coorg the fall has been comparatively slight. There has been no rain again in Sind; elsewhere in the Bombay Presidency it has been general, but more is reported to be urgently wanted in some places. The Berars and Hyderabad have received a fair quantity during the week, and showers have fallen throughout the Central India States and Rajputana, but more is also wanted in these tracts. No report has been received from Burmah. In Assam the districts of Lakhimpur and Sylhet have received heavy rains, and in the latter district portions of the recently flooded lands have again been submerged. In Bengal and the Central Provinces the fall has been general and sufficient, and in Behar it has been excessive. Rain has held off in the North Western Provinces and Oudh and the Punjab, and the heat has been intense. Latest reports show that in the former province wet weather has now set in, but the Punjab as yet is practically rainless. Agricultural prospects remain unchanged in Madras. Kharif operations are being actively carried on everywhere; sowings have been completed in parts of Bombay, and have commenced in parts of the Punjab; elsewhere they are in active progress. Heavy rain has injured the jute and rice crops on low lands in Behar, otherwise the prospects in Bengal are very favourable. Locusts have appeared in parts of Rajputana, and continue to be a source of danger to the coming crops in Bombay. Cattle disease of a mild type is generally prevalent. Prices remain stationary, except in the North Western Provinces, where they show a tendency to rise. The public health is improving on the whole, but the mortality from cholera has been severe in Puna and Ahmednagar, and is increasing in Nagpur.”

“Heavy rain has fallen at Outtaek, Moulmein, and Akyab; elsewhere in Burma, Assam, and Bengal the rain has been lighter than in the previous week, but sufficient for present needs. Abundant rain and favourable weather are reported from the Central Provinces, and the monsoon current seems to have partially reached the North-West Provinces and Oudh and the Punjab, though the rainfall has as yet been slight and insufficient. According to latest reports westerly winds prevail. In Central and Southern India more or less rain has fallen everywhere; in the Southern Mahratta Country, in Mysore, and parts of Rajputana a further supply is much needed; elsewhere it has been generally sufficient, while unprecedented floods are reported from Surat. In Sind the dry weather of previous weeks has disappeared; a moderate quantity of rain has fallen and more is expected, but the rivers are unusually low. Agricultural operations are in progress throughout India, and, except in the tracts already mentioned as in need of more rain, prospects so far are favourable. Harvesting continues in Madras, and the standing crops in that Presidency and Mysore are in good condition. Rises are being sown and transplanted in Assam and Bengal, and in the latter province jute, sugarcane, and indigo are thriving wherever they have not been injured by floods. Locusts are still prevalent in Bombay, but appear to be disappearing from Rajputana. Cattle disease exists in most provinces, but is at present severe only in parts of Burma. Prices are variable, with a downward tendency wherever good rain has fallen. Cholera still rages in Puna and Ahmednagar, elsewhere it is on the decrease; but fever is prevalent.

The Madras Mail says:—“In referring to the appointment of Colonel W. K. Elles, C.B., to the command of the Nagpore Brigade of the Madras Army, we complained that the old custom of giving brigades to senior colonels who were serving in India had been set aside, and that men were now brought out to India to fill these coveted appointments. One of our Bombay contemporaries echoed the same complaint from that presidency. We have discovered, however, that there is some reason for the new departure in the rule which limits regimental commands to five years. It appears that, in practice, this rule allowed no officers of the rank of full colonel to be in India, except those belonging to the Royal Artillery, and it would be manifestly unfair to give the gunners a monopoly of these Indian brigade commands. Under the new rules there are only three (Queen's) colonels in the Madras Presidency eligible for brigade commands, and all these have but recently reached the rank of colonel. It is wisely laid down that no officer shall be appointed to a brigade command unless he shall have served a certain time in India, and shall have held command of a regiment, or some high position on the staff.

The Pioneer understands that the Government of India have not accepted the recommendation of the Horse Guards as to the formation of the “Departmental Corps” to which we recently alluded. The reasons for the rejection of the scheme are partly the expense, but principally the inconvenience which seemed likely to result from the proposed system of concentrating all documents of the Unattached List men at army head-quarters. It was felt that this would be no improvement upon the present method of transferring the papers of such men from corps to corps as the regiments leave India for England. Nevertheless, it may be thought that the formation of a departmental corps, after the plan proposed would be advantageous in many ways to young soldiers on their emancipation from the bonds of regimental discipline.

Inconvenience and unnecessary correspondence having been occasioned by disregard of the Bengal Army Regulations, section 13, paragraphs 155-6, and 163, which require officers proceeding on furlough out of India to report their embarkation direct to the Military Department, Calcutta, and on return from furlough to present the India Office letter of permission to do so, and report their arrival in person at the office of the Deputy Assistant Adjutant General at the port of debarkation, his Excellency the Commander-in-Chief directs that these orders may be more strictly observed in future.

The 2nd Battalion (Duke of Cambridge's Own) Middlesex Regiment, having nearly completed its three years' service in British Burma, proceeds from Rangoon to the Madras Presidency next cold weather. It is more than probable that this battalion will proceed, on first arrival at Madras, to Bangalore, to take part in the camp of exercise to be held at that station next cold weather. On the conclusion of the camp of exercise, it is intended that the regiment shall proceed to Secunderabad. It will be relieved in British Burma by the 2nd Battalion Prince Albert's Light Infantry (the Somersetshire Regiment).

TELEGRAPHIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE following is the usual weekly telegram from the Times correspondent, dated Calcutta, August 5 :—

"Whatever be the ultimate fate of the Criminal Jurisdiction Bill, it is now almost certain that if not altogether withdrawn it will be passed in the form of practically a new measure, and will fail to effect what Mr. Ilbert declared to be its principal object—namely, the removal of all disqualifications for judicial office founded on the distinction of race. The Bombay Government is understood to have expressed an opinion that it is impossible to ignore race differences. The Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab admits that the fear with which Europeans regard the extension of jurisdiction, whether well founded or not, is thoroughly genuine and should command the deepest respect. He proposes a course that would emphasise race distinctions by imposing long and severe tests upon native magistrates before granting them the jurisdiction in question, which he would give at once to any European first-class magistrate. The Lieutenant-Governor of the North-West Provinces is believed to have recommended the entire omission of the first section of the Bill. He is said to hold that the proposed qualification for appointment as Justice of the Peace—namely, that the officer must be a first-class magistrate—is a very variable test of special fitness, and to advise the Legislature to lay down a less flexible rule, giving jurisdiction only to natives who may be appointed to the office of magistrate of a district, and permitting them to retain such jurisdiction only so long as they hold that office. It is understood that Sir Alfred Lyall would recommend no further alteration of the law, and would not invest the native Sessional Judges with power to try Europeans. It is also stated that he declares the question of extending the jurisdiction over Europeans to be in no way an urgent one so far as the North-West Provinces are concerned, inasmuch as not only are the native civilians in the Provinces few in number, but the cases against Europeans are also few, and generally arise in or near some large station, where the offices of magistrate and of Sessions Judge are not likely to pass out of the hands of European officers. It would seem that Sir Alfred Lyall's view has the support of the best classes of natives in his district.

"The Chief Commissioner of Assam points out that the Bill goes far beyond his recommendations of last year. If it were modified, he would himself consider it a good Bill, but not of much practical importance; and in the circumstances it had better be withdrawn. No compromise, he adds, will satisfy the Europeans, and they are the one intelligent, energetic, and improving class in Assam. He has already painfully felt the estrangement which the Bill has produced, and it would require a very strong case to justify an enactment which should exacerbate and perpetuate that estrangement. He thinks that no such case has been made out, and that the Bill will produce more harm than good. To withdraw it will only be to admit that a step in advance had been taken too soon, and such withdrawal need be no cause of shame to the Government or indication of a change in their general policy.

"The Chief Commissioner of Burmah is believed to be strongly opposed to the measure. Nothing has yet transpired regarding the opinions sent in from the Central Provinces.

"A letter signed 'Mahomed Noor Khan, Pensioner, late Rassaldar, 7th Bengal Cavalry,' published in a recent issue of the Pioneer, gives a remarkable example of how faintly the feelings of the Bengalee agitators are shared by the manlier up-country races. The writer roundly asserts, as the result of twenty-six years' experience, that cases, civil or military, are more impartially tried by Europeans than by natives. He proceeds thus :

"With the exception of the obese and feeble Bengalees, who would be found utterly incapable of defending their country should an emergency arise, no other race in India would hail the passing of a measure which, instead of improving the condition of the people, would simply entail disasters and misfortunes unheard of and unprecedented, on this unhappy land. And if the Government be desirous of completely ruining the country, it cannot do so better, or sooner, than by passing this obnoxious Bill. My object in addressing you is that no heed should be paid to these clamorous Baboos; that the Bill, already a source of discord and ill-feeling, may be consigned to the flames; and that the Government of the country may be carried on upon the same principles as heretofore."

"Some amusement, coupled with a little indignation, has been caused in this country by the persistent efforts made by certain persons at home to attribute the opposition to this Bill solely to the Civil Service and the Bar. As a matter of fact, no two classes of the Anglo-Indian community are less likely to be personally affected by the measure. The opposition was not commenced by, and is not confined to, any particular classes; it pervades the entire Anglo-Indian community, and is due to the deep-seated belief that the Bill is wrong in principle, and likely to be disastrous in its results. And signs are not wanting that any announcement of an intention to go on with the measure will lead to a renewed outburst of indignation throughout the country.

"The Executive Committee of the Calcutta Exhibition has issued a report of the proceedings at its last sitting. Mr. Joubert, the promoter of the scheme, asserts his belief that the Exhibition will rank first in the list of similar undertakings in the East. Up to June 22, 104,450 square feet of space had been taken up. The period for receiving applications for space closes on August 15. Great Britain and her colonies occupy about three-fourths of the whole. Elaborate precautions are being taken for the security of the goods in the Exhibition, and the question of their safe custody in transit is engaging the attention of the committee. A show of live stock, including exhibits from Australia, and from all parts of India, is to be added to the other attractions. The question of accommodation for visitors is a very difficult one, and will exercise the utmost energies of the committee. Houses are already being let at fancy prices, and the hotels are hardly sufficient for the ordinary winter incursion of strangers. There is some talk of forming a standing camp.

"The Education Commission is now approaching the end of its labours, and the members are beginning to leave Simla for their respective provinces. The report is said to require only a few finishing touches, and may be expected to appear early in September.

"The harvest prospects of Meerut and the surrounding districts are at present gloomy, owing to the long-continued drought.

"The statistics of tea cultivation in Assam for the last year show that 1,017 tea gardens existed, as against 1,058 in the previous year, but this decrease in the number of gardens was apparently due to amalgamations since the area under tea increased, while the total yield was much higher than in any former year. The average price, however, fell very low, being often insufficient to cover the cost of production. The prospects look better this year, and the new trade with Australia and America is expanding.

"The trade and navigation returns for June last and for the same month in 1881 and 1882 show the following results :—

|   | June, 1883.Rupees. | June, 1882.Rupees. | June, 1881.Rupees. |

|             | 1883.Rupees. | 1882.Rupees. | 1881.Rupees. |

"The Ameer will move from Cabul towards Candahar and Herat before the autumn sets in. He has expressed his gratitude towards the British Government for the subsidy recently granted to him. The rumour started by a Lahore newspaper that other Afridi tribes had joined the Kohat Pass section in closing the pass is officially denied. The Government has decided to ask the tribesmen to state their intentions upon the subject of keeping the pass open for the conveyance of salt as well as for other traffic. The Maharajah of Cashmere has determined to help the Chitral Chief with troops against the men of Daree and Jangir. These districts are not to be permanently occupied; and Aman-ul-Mulk is to be invited to visit Yasan and make the necessary arrangements."

The Northern India Rifle Association in their annual report announce that their competitions will in future be confined to the Bengal Presidency. The Pioneer thinks that it is hardly uncharitable to suppose that this decision, which received the unanimous assent of the Council, has been arrived at in consequence of the extraordinary scoring achieved at some stations in the minor presidencies.

Our Simla correspondent writes :—"It is probable that General Tanner, commanding at Quetta, accompanied by Sir R. Sandeman, the Agent, will shortly visit Thull Chotiali, with a small column, for the purpose of selecting a new cantonment near Chotiali, probably at Gombaz. The present cantonment is at Dubbur Koti, near Thull. The expedition will also be under them, in the hope that the presence of troops will have a good effect on the tribes who are in a disturbed condition."

The Government of India have approved of the orders issued by his Excellency the Commander-in-Chief, for the relief of the detachment of Royal Artillery at Attock, from battery headquarters at Campbellpore, every two months between 1st April and 1st October, and every three months between 1st October and 1st April.

The Englishman says :—"The proposal for the formation of a naval artillery volunteer corps is now before the Government and we have every reason to believe will be accepted. As a proof of the popularity of the move, we hear that about 120 members have already joined it. About twenty-five more men are required to form two batteries."

INDIAN JOINT-STOCK BANKS.

[FROM THE "TIMES."]

The subjoined letter is from a correspondent who is interested in one of the principal Indian banks. We are of opinion that the views he expresses are in the main correct, and that the apprehension felt in some quarters is exaggerated, though by no means unnatural, considering the reticence of the directors of the institution in question. The situation of the Indian banks generally has much improved during the last year or two, partly because the Eastern trade is now on a much sounder basis than it was previous to the autumn of 1878, and partly because the banks themselves have at length resolutely faced the fact that they had made losses during the period of depression which followed 1873. There can be no doubt that the Eastern trade was "overbanked" for some time after that year, having regard to the amount of business there was to do. The fall in the value of silver and of all securities based on silver was also an unfortunate circumstance for them, and contributed not a little to their difficulties. These difficulties would, however, have been far less serious than they actually were if the banks, with, we believe, only one exception, had not pursued an unwise policy in their treatment of them. Instead of deciding boldly to "cut their losses" as soon as it became clear that no material recovery in the price of silver was probable, most of them persisted in taking rupees at their old valuation, while some even speculated for a rise in the metal. All that, however, is now a thing of the past. The Indian banks have now "set their house in order" so far as silver is concerned. Not only that, but expenses have been cut down and unprofitable branch establishments, the legacies of a period of undue but pardonable hopefulness, have been reduced, or abandoned altogether. Some of the relics of that over-sanguine past are still a source of trouble, as the circular just published by the Oriental Banking Corporation shows; but by far the greater part of the bad business with which this and other institutions had saddled themselves has been liquidated. It is not improbable that attempts may be made this autumn to urge on the proprietors of some of the Indian banks the advisability of amalgamation. Even if such a measure were practicable, it would not, in all probability, help them so much as a strict adherence to caution and rigid economy in the carrying on of business, and the difficulties in the way of any scheme of amalgamation are much greater than those who advocate it fancy.

"Sir,—The extreme reticence necessary in banking affairs is occasionally injurious to the banks themselves, especially when many of the shareholders, as in the case of the Indian banks, have been accustomed to live in an atmosphere of publicity in public as well as in social matters, and do not comprehend the withholding of all information regarding their property. Hearing nothing of what is taking place inside the bank doors, they seize upon the wildest rumours floating outside which alarmists or those interested in the frequent transfer of shares scatter abroad.

"This has been very distinctly shown in the case of the largest of the Indian banks. The stock has been alarmingly depressed and many shareholders (ladies and widows among the number), whose incomes depend on the prosperity of the bank, have been led to sell their shares at half their real value. It is true that six months is a long period to wait for a half-yearly statement, and perhaps it would be better if this were bridged over by a bi-monthly circular, mentioning in a few words the general welfare of the bank or the occurrence of any serious loss. At present, when such happens, it is not in the power of the bank to keep it quite secret. It becomes known on the Stock Exchange, and is very likely magnified to frighten holders and bring about a double transaction of selling one stock and buying into another, while the unfortunate victims whose money is the shuttlecock, and who have been the last to hear of their loss, are met at the banks by long-drawn faces, and assurances that to tell them how their paid servants had been using their funds would be highly prejudicial to their interests.

"In the present instance holders of stock might have found on inquiry, as I did, that nothing had occurred to cause such a depreciation in their property. There is no object in managers and directors being too reticent of general information which has nothing to do with the actual working of a bank, and may cause an injurious speculation in its shares; while shareholders should not be too readily alarmed nor listen to every idle rumour. They should also be warned that, as many shares must have been sold for the account, each settlement day for a short time is likely to again cause a depreciation till those shares now in the hands of speculators are finally placed.

"Yours, &amp;c.,

"J. C. B."

ASSAULT BY NATIVES UPON A TEA-PLANTER.

Mr. A. E. C. Casey, C.S., magistrate, Naini Tal, gave judgment on Saturday, the 30th ult., in the case of the Government v. Gopiya Bhoal, Bocchiya Bhoal, Khooshiya Bhoal, and Jogiya Bhoal. In his judgment, Mr. Casey said:—Four defendants, Gopiya, Bocchiya, Khooshiya (a young fellow, aged about eighteen or nineteen), and Jogiya, are charged with two grave assaults, committed within half an hour of each other, on Mr. Newton, tea-planter of Bhowali, five miles distant from Naini Tal. I have discharged Jogiya. It is quite certain that he was not engaged in the first assault, and it is not quite certain that he was engaged in the second assault. As to the other defendants, I consider the charges clearly proved against them. The assaults arose out of money disputes. The defendants demanded more than complainant would pay them; and then defendants determined to take the law into their own hands, and compel Mr. Newton to satisfy their demands. The first assault demands severe punishment. For an equal to seize an equal by the beard is in the East a grave insult. For low-caste servants to seize by the beard their master, an English gentleman (an elderly and not strong gentleman too) is both a foully-dishonouring and cowardly assault; and it adds to the gravity of the offence that it was prompted by the desire to compel the victim to accede to demands which he did not deem just. For this offence, I find the three defendants guilty under Section 355, I. P. C., and I sentence Gopiya and Bocchiya to six months' rigorous imprisonment each, and Khooshiya (who is young) to three months' rigorous imprisonment. The second assault was also a grave one. The defendants deliberately waited on the road with the intention of restraining and preventing complainant, and in pursuance of their aim they seized complainant's reins, kept back his horse, and inflicted hurt on him and on his chowdhrai. For this offence I find defendants guilty under Section 323, I. P. C., and I sentence Gopiya to six months' rigorous imprisonment, Bocchiya to three months' rigorous imprisonment, and Khooshiya to one month's rigorous imprisonment.

THE RELEASE OF THE EDITOR OF THE "BENGALÉE."

A telegram to the Times of India, dated Calcutta, July 4, says:—

"Surendranath Bannerjee was released from gaol this morning. The European gaoler drove him home in a tikka gharry from the debtors' gate of the gaol at 5.45 a.m. It was generally believed that the hour fixed for his release was 6.30, and shortly before that time some forty or fifty carriages assembled in front of the main gate of the gaol. The authorities informed the occupants of the carriages that Surendranath had left, but despite the heavy rain it was nearly an hour before they were convinced of the truth of the statement. In the meantime, Surendranath Bannerjee on reaching his house at Toltollah, found an arch of welcome and a large number of Bengalees assembled who received him with floral honours. He then drove back to meet those who had been to the gaol and returned preceding them in a sort of procession. He received a very noisy welcome, but his admirers were mostly school-boys, and it is very remarkable that after all the fuss made by the Native Press and the repeated asseverations of universal sympathy, not a single native gentleman of note or position was present to welcome him on his release either at the gaol or at his house. We learn from a Calcutta paper that Surendranath Bannerjee was presented after his release with a handsome silver inkstand and pen, and the following books:—'Life of Garibaldi,' 'Fifty Famous Women and the Lessons of their Lives,' and 'The Speeches of Lord Ripon.'"

SCURRILITY IN THE NATIVE PRESS.

The Indian Chronicle, in referring to a scurrilous article published in a recent edition of Reis and Rayyet, says:—"At the present moment when the friends and well-wishers of the Native Press are profusely spending their breath and ink in advising it to moderate its tone, and show to the world that in imitating Englishmen, it does not imitate their vices and failings, it is certainly painful to find some of the native papers equalling, if not excelling, some Anglo-Indian writers in the art of abusing. We can suggest nothing in palliation of the mischievous tone and spirit of the article of the Reis and Rayyet, nor can we fathom the motive of our contemporary; and when we take into consideration the wit and wisdom generally brought forward by this paper in the discussion of public questions, our surprise becomes complete. For insinuations coarsely conveyed, and indelicate hints made in defiance to all manner of decency and etiquette, the article in question will long remain a reproach to native journalism; and in such papers as the Bengal Times or the Englishman continue to talk of the native in the wildest term of vituperation, what shall we say to them? The Reis and Rayyet by writing in this fashion has done good to nobody, he has done great harm to himself, to the interests of his party, and his country-men in general. Did our contemporary take into his consideration the bad example he was setting? We would not wonder if pseudo-patriotic schoolboys inspired with the spirit of that article, should rush into print and into the streets and commit marvels of foolishness."

FALSE CHARGES.

The Englishman says:—

It is curious to observe the difference between the number of false charges in the Criminal Courts, and of false claims in the Civil Courts, of the Bombay Presidency. It is officially stated that the extent to which trivial or false complaints are made may be judged from the fact that one-fourth of the offences reported were struck off by the magistrates as "no crime." In the Civil Courts, on the other hand, ninety-one per cent. of the suits actually tried were decided in favour of the plaintiff, which shows that, taking on average, there could not have been many false claims preferred, unless we are prepared to prove that justice was hoodwinked. The contrast shows how utterly fallacious is the analogy which some of the less wary advocates of Mr. Ilbert's Bill have attempted to set up between the Civil and the Criminal Courts. Altogether, crime and litigation appear to be on the decrease in the Bombay Presidency. In the Native States under the Bombay Government, the establishment of a system of police and regular courts is said to have wrought a great change in the inhabitants of what were lawless countries, the haunt of bandits and outlaws, but are now as peaceful as ordinary English districts.

MEETING AGAINST THE BENGAL RENT BILL AT MONGHYR.

An enthusiastic and influential meeting of the Landholders of the District of Monghyr, Mr. Dear presiding, was held on the 30th of June, at which the following resolutions were carried.

I.

That the provisions of the Bengal Tenancy Bill are subversive of the rights of the landholders, rights which have been recognised by the Regulations relating to the Permanent Settlement and the course of legislation ending in Act 10 of 1859.

Proposed by H. Dear, Esq., seconded by Dhirsj Karan, Esq. Carried nem. con.

II.

That the power reserved in Regulation 1 of 1793 in favour of legislation on behalf of the tenants does not justify the present measure.

Moved by Moulvi Ahmuddoolah, seconded by Babu Shamul Dass Chakerburty. Carried.

III.

That interference with landed rights possessed by a large class of the community is neither expedient nor proper, unless there be emergent necessity, and that when such interference is made, compensation is usually given.

Moved by G. Thomas, Esq., seconded by Babu Bolaki Lal. Carried unanimously.

IV.

That in the present circumstances of the Lower Provinces there is no such grave necessity as would justify interference on behalf of the Legislature in the manner proposed in the Bill.

Proposed by Babu Kamta Prasad, seconded by Babu Seetul Prasad. Carried unanimously.

V.

That a memorial be forwarded to the Viceroy in Council against the Bill.

Moved by H. Dear, Esq., seconded by C. T. Ambler, Esq. Carried nem. con.

VI.

That subscriptions in aid of the fund proposed to be raised by the Bhagulpur Landholders' Association be collected and sent to the Secretary of the Association, and that a committee consisting of the under-mentioned gentlemen, with power to add to their number, be formed for obtaining signatures to the memorial and for collecting subscriptions.

Moved by Babu Kumleshri Prasad, seconded by Babu Gunga Prasad. Carried unanimously.

Members.—H. Dear Esq., G. Thomas Esq., C. T. Ambler, Esq., Babu Kumleshri Prasad, Gunga Prasad, Bolaki Lal, Akhil Chandra Mullick, Shamul Das Chakerburty, Seetul Prasad, Kamta Prasad, Joughiry Lal, Moulvi Ahmedullah Khan; Dhirsj Karan, Esq., Secretary.

The landholders present subscribed to the proposed fund.

THE "SELF-GOVERNMENT BUSINESS."

The appendix to the report of the Madras Local Self-Government Committee is full of amusing reading. One of the native municipal commissioners of Bellary, Mr. Ebrahim Sait, thus delivers himself on the burning question as to whether the Collector should or should not be president of the municipality:—"I earnestly propose that in this district self-government business is not approvable, and therefore the Collector of this district is to be president of every municipal commission of this district, and if the president is removed from the Municipality the townspeople will not be satisfied with the doings of commissioners and the self-government." Lord Ripon will be painfully shocked at the contemptuous way in which this worthy Mussulman gentleman speaks of the "self-government business." Yet there is a ring of honest conviction in the manner in which Mr. Ebrahim Sait expresses his opinion. When the Duke of Edinburgh visited Madras there was a great meeting at the Banqueting Hall to discuss how his visit should be celebrated. Mr. J. B. Norton, backed by several of the better educated natives, proposed that money should be collected for founding a scholarship at the local university. But a wealthy native merchant, the late Mr. Changanaloy Naick, a man with a thorough knowledge of his fellow-countrymen, though possessing but a limited command of the English language, had the courage to oppose Mr. Norton's proposal. "Scholarships," said the native merchant, "would make the land dull. The people of India don't welcome their princes with scholarships, but with fireworks." And the meeting enthusiastically carried the proposition for fireworks as against scholarships. Mr. Ebrahim Sait's contempt for "self-government business" is quite on a par with that of Mr. Changanaloy Naick for scholarships.—Madras Mail.

NOTICES OF BOOKS.

THE "ARMY AND NAVY MAGAZINE" FOR AUGUST.

In the Army and Navy Magazine for August Colonel Malleison commences a series of accounts of "The Battle Fields of Germany," which will be found valuable and instructive reading. The field of Breitenfeld, or Leipzig, as it is very generally called, and the defeat of Tilly by Gustavus Adolphus, form the subject of the article in the present number. Mr. Holmes furnishes an article on "French Colonial Aggression," which will be found specially interesting at the present moment. The valuable accounts of "Indian Districts during the Revolt" are continued by Mr. Keane. The Banda and Allahabad districts, almost the very centre of the Mutiny or revolt, form the subject on this occasion, and it is needless to say that they are handled in a most masterly manner. The effects of alteration in the term of soldiers' service from the old-established "long" term to "short" periods is dealt with in two papers by different authors—Mr. Stone, late of the 35th Regiment, and Mr. Lawrence Archer. The subject is attacked by each from quite different directions and even points of view, and it is interesting to notice how they both come to a nearly similar conclusion—a fact which shows the strongest probability of its being the correct one. Dr. Hayman concludes the number with "A Few Facts from the Desert Camp," in which he gives excerpts from private correspondence which have not been hitherto available as to the inner life of our troops during the Egyptian campaign, and strongly pointing the moral of the folly of a nation like ours being unprepared with a proper transport train.

CORRESPONDENCE.

JOHN BRUCE NORTON.

TO THE EDITOR OF "ALLEN'S INDIAN MAIL."

SIR,—I shall be obliged to you if you will allow me to correct an error into what I perceive that I have fallen in. My former letter, concerning the memoirs of Norton, writing from memory, a great risk at any time and in age a great danger, I wrote of his having hidden his poetical endowment. I wrote under the belief then that the work of which the Author gave me a copy, was a printed not a published volume. I now see on looking at it, that it had reached a second edition when he presented to me my prized copy. Going through it only cursorily—for close study is no longer in my power—I see such evidence of his varied and extensive reading in literature ancient, modern, home and foreign that I feel as though I had done injustice to his memory in not making more particular mention of his wealth of illustration. It all comes back to me now that I look into his book, it is not a new discovery, the memory of it was temporarily lost when I wrote my letter. Let me then add this postscript to it, that the little work in question will amply repay any reader of it, even if not a lover of good verse; in the variety and richness of the illustrations of the sonnets furnished by the notes. As the work reached a second edition many must have enjoyed the treat, and I rejoice to think so well stored a heap of collected wisdom was not hidden, but given to the general view. I have the honour to be, Sir, your obedient servant,

MR. BRIGHT ON THE ILBERT BILL.

TO THE EDITOR OF "ALLEN'S INDIAN MAIL."

SIR.—The applause earned by Mr Bright's speech last Wednesday, when he upheld the above Bill, must be ascribed to some feeling other than a conviction of the soundness of the measure; since his arguments were nowise calculated to produce such conviction. He declared that "if the Bill did not become law, the hope of the people of India would be blasted, and their souls would be filled with despair," but he never said what benefit the people of India were likely to derive from the proposed enactment. He must, however, be aware that the measure had never been asked for by the people of India, that it had originated in a narrow section of Anglo-Indian Officials belonging to a class traditionally antagonistic to the independent Englishman in India; that the Bill proposes no improvement or change whatever in the administration of justice to the Natives, but would subject Englishmen to Criminal Courts, where false accusations, owing to the influence of a notoriously corrupt police, are successfully established with alarming frequency.

Ignoring these essential features in the case, the right hon. gentleman stigmatised the opposition to the Bill as "very discreditable," and he attributed it in a great measure to lawyers. "He had been told that the appointment of a native judge pro tem. in the absence of other judges, to act as chief justice was an unpleasant pill for the English lawyers, as one of them, he supposed, had hoped to have the office." These are certainly not arguments, but unsupported charges or insinuations, and such as cannot claim to be of a very creditable character.

On the other hand, some of Mr. BRIGHT's statements on the occasion would show that he did not himself entertain any great idea of the benefit to be obtained from the measure, or any great fear of the disloyalty of which he spoke as likely to arise from the withdrawal of the Bill. He said, for instance, at the commencement of his speech:—"The subject we are about to consider appears to me to be one of no great moment;" "The cause of this clamour and discord is a very small Bill. I asked the other day a gentleman well acquainted with the affairs of India to give me some account of what the Bill was intended to do. He said the result of it, if passed, would be to admit three or four natives to the exercise of certain powers which they did not possess; that the increased powers with which they would be intrusted, were to occupy a certain rank and that they were to have these powers after some years of service." Now could Mr. Bright and his hearers believe that the promise of a certain rank and of certain powers to be given to three or four natives after some years' service, could be considered by the people of India as a boon the loss of which would blast their hope, fill their souls with despair, and engender disloyalty in their hearts, such as would be formidable to the English in India?

A careful and dispassionate consideration of Mr. Bright's speech leaves the painful impression that the right honourable gentleman knew very little of the subject on which he spoke, and that his eloquence on the occasion was not exerted in the interests of the people of India.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
J. DACOSTA.

UPPER ASSAM.

TO THE EDITOR OF "ALLEN'S INDIAN MAIL."

SIR,—While wise heads in England are trying to depreciate the quality of the coal at Makum, found near the surface, there is good reason to believe that inexhaustible supplies of our most precious mineral exist not only at Makum, but in the neighbourhood of Jaipoor, in fact throughout the valley of the Upper Brahmaputra. All the lower ranges of the Naga Hills appear to be full of coal; the Jaipoor coal is said to compare favourably with good English coal.

In my last I tried to impress on your readers how penny unwise we are to grudge the expenditure required to make our army efficient. Some English economists are hugging themselves with delight at the saving effected by decreasing our English troops in India by 6,000 men. If every soldier costs £100, why here is an immediate gain of £600,000 a year, or say seven millions of rupees! I only wish to remark that a rebellion in India, if temporarily successful, would cost more than France had to pay for the Franco-German war. So great is the value of our interests in India, that in one month a frightful bill of costs and damages would be run up.

Why should not the British Government defray the cost of 60,000 English soldiers by selling its concealed treasures in Upper Assam and Central India?—Your obedient servant,
August 3. T.

MAIL NEWS.

Disastrous floods have taken place during the week preceding the departure of the mail, in Guzerat owing to an unusually heavy rainfall throughout the districts watered by the Taptee river. The Taptee rose forty-six feet above its ordinary level, a state of things without parallel during the present century. The town of Surat was flooded for two days, and immense damage was done to both public and private property in consequence. Six lives are said to have been lost in Surat city, and there must also have been considerable loss of life in the districts, although no reports have yet been received. A fund has been opened for the relief of the thousands of people rendered destitute by the floods, and at a meeting of influential natives held in Bombay on Saturday nearly Rs. 40,000 were subscribed by those present. H. E. Sir James Fergusson has subscribed Rs. 500 to the fund. The floods caused great damage to the Bombay, Baroda and Central India Railway, and through communication of every kind was absolutely stopped for about forty-eight hours. The English mails from the North-West Provinces, including those from Simla, were delayed by the floods, and did not reach Bombay in time to catch the outgoing mail last Wednesday. Active measures are being taken by the railway authorities to restore communication, but several days must necessarily elapse before even a temporary means of through transit can be devised. On the Great Indian Peninsula Railway affairs are assuming a brighter aspect, but in this case also it will be some time before the damage is repaired.

FASHIONABLE WEDDING AT SIMLA.—The monotonous round of social distractions at Simla has been pleasantly relieved by a wedding, which took place there on Thursday last, when the eldest daughter of Colonel Chesney, R.E., was married to Major R. P. Williamson of the 23rd Royal Irish Fusiliers. Archdeacon Mathew was the officiating priest, and Lord William Beresford best man. Two daintily-dressed little pages—Masters Robin Grant and Rowland Baring—bore the bride's train of cream brocade satin, and five small bridesmaids—the two sisters of the bride, Miss Esmie Wilson, Miss Bee Cole, and Miss Dorothy Allen—in primrose and white, fresh from fingers of Kate Greenaway, followed with baskets of sun-flowers and bridal favours. Of guests it would be easier to say who was not there than who was, for nearly all Simla had been bidden, and its beauty and its chivalry responded, to the number of at least three hundred. The service—a choral service—over, the wedding party followed the happy pair to Colonel Chesney's house; but as they left the church, through a rift in the threatening clouds which had massed upon the nearest hills all day till then, the sun shone out, brightening the whole scene with sympathetic gladness. There was much champagne and some brief but hearty toasting, with leisure to admire the many beautiful presents, the offerings of appreciative friends. Then the wedded couple left for "Wild-flower Hall," a country house in the neighbourhood of Simla, amid a plentiful shower of rice-grains, not too many to express the abundance of warm wishes for the lifelong happiness of a manly, cheery, good fellow, the bridegroom, and the comely, kindly maiden, his bride.—Pioneer.

THE ILBERT BILL AND TRUCULENT RADICALISM.

A RADICAL in power, like a beggar on horseback, is a very terrible fellow. There have been no Coercion Bills like the Coercion Bills of the Radicals. There is no such thorough-going Jingo as your Radical Jingo: "One man is as good as another" is the Radical's cry; but he always adds, "and a great deal better too," as soon as he gets the chance. And the high-handed, arbitrary truculence, that is the most striking characteristic of modern Radicalism, has never been more audaciously manifested than in the treatment which the opponents of the Ilbert Bill are receiving from the Radical Party. The Radicals have a notion that the Anglo-Indians, whose dearest interests are affected by this measure, are a poor, weak folk, from the point of view of party politics; so, whether we look to the defiant attitude of Lord Ripon towards the non-official Englishmen in India, or to the insulting remarks of Mr. Bright on the opponents of the Bill in England, or even to the rowdy howls of a small Radical minority in the great East-end meeting held at Limehouse Town Hall on Thursday last, we find the same overbearing insolence, the same intolerance of honest opinion, and the same determination to overpower argument by force.

In our special supplement to-day we give a full report of Mr. Bright's speech at the meeting in Willis's Rooms last Wednesday; so that our Anglo-Indian readers—and especially those, if any such there be, who still believe in the good-faith of the supporters of the Ilbert Bill—may judge for themselves whether we exceed the strictest limits of truth, when we characterise that speech as a shameless farrago of abuse, claptrap, and misstatement. With regard to the abuse of opponents, even Sir George Campbell felt compelled to protest against the lavish imputation of base motives to the Covenanted Civil Service of India. Sir George had not sufficient magnanimity to include among the objects of his championship the Indian Bench or Bar, or indeed any class of those bespattered by Mr. Bright's venom, except that one to which he himself belonged; but another of the speakers at the Willis's Rooms meeting, Dr. Markby, supplied this omission in a letter to the Pall Mall Gazette, which we print elsewhere. Probably the least pleasant reflection that must have occurred to every Anglo-Indian reader of Mr. Bright's speech, was, that there were present on the platform, at the moment the slanders were uttered, Anglo-Indians of high character and position who were perfectly cognisant of the groundlessness of the vile charges brought against the Indian Bar and the Indian Services; and who nevertheless were content to sit quiet, as consenting parties to one of the most disgraceful breaches of the Ninth Commandment ever known in English political life. Hardly more excusable was their silent acquiescence in Mr. Bright's claptrap; for we can hardly believe that either Sir George Campbell or Mr. Markby would seriously assent to the proposition that, if the Ilbert Bill were withdrawn, "then the hope of the people of India would be blasted, and instead of hope, their souls would be filled with despair"—or again, to the malicious insinuations about India being "held as a field for English ambition, and for English greed." But what can be said of those gentlemen who, knowing all about the Statutory Civil Service, knowing that the Native competition-wallahs are a dwindling class, and that the Native Judges of the future will all be appointed in the country, could quietly listen whilst Mr. Bright was piling up the agony about the difficulties imposed on those Natives who wish to obtain the Ilbert Bill jurisdiction—they "must come over from India to this country to be educated, they must go back and suffer all the inconvenience of such a regulation," and so on. Or again, when Mr. Forster spoke of the "interesting and informing fact that the outcry against the Ilbert Bill was little, until the local self-government measure appeared," is it credible that of the Anglo-Indians present on the platform not one was aware of the actual dates of the Ilbert Bill (first heard of in February, 1883), and of the Local Self-Government resolution of May 18, 1882? And Mr. Forster also repeated Mr. Bright's story about Indians coming over here—"at great cost and with great trouble"—evidently believing this to be a part of the preparation demanded for the Ilbert Bill jurisdiction; and then he proceeded to excuse himself from replying to the letter of the High Court Judges on the ground of its occupying three columns of the Times. And public opinion in England on the most vital points of Indian policy is, forsooth, to be guided by those who find the labour of mastering three columns of the Times more arduous than the importance of the subject warrants their attempting! Arguments are clearly thrown away on opponents who treat them thus. When no possible answer can be found to the hard facts adduced by the Anglo-Indians, Mr. Bright meets them with the Radical sic volo, sic jubeo; attributes the meanest motives to those who dare to oppose him, and trusts to the ignorance of the populace, and to the cowardice or insincerity of his allies, for the justification of his slanders.

ANGLO-INDIAN SUPPORTERS OF LORD RIPON'S POLICY.

MR. CHESON, the amiable and much esteemed Secretary of the Aborigines Protection Society, appears to have got hold of the notion that Mr. Lal Mohun Ghose and his friends are "aborigines," and stand in need of protection; for he has joined Mr. Foggo, "late member of the Bombay Legislative Council," in vigorously whipping up a list of the Anglo-Indian "supporters of Lord Ripon's policy." The result of the combined labours of Mr. Foggo and the Aborigines was first published on the back of a handbill that was distributed at Mr. Bright's meeting in Willis's Rooms last week. It has since appeared several times in print; and now, in the Times of Saturday, it is modestly put forward as a "First List of Anglo-Indians (sic) who have communicated their names to the British Indian Committee as Supporters of Lord Ripon's Policy." Astonishing to relate, this "first list" contains no less than forty-one names—including such distinguished "Anglo-Indians" as Professor Max Müller, LL.D., Sir Wilfrid Lawson, M.P., Sir Charles Hobhouse, Bart., and Professor Rhys Davids.

The last-named learned Professor is triumphantly stated to be "late of the Ceylon Civil Service;" and that is, of course, quite near enough for the purposes of Mr. Foggo and the Aborigines—like the young gentleman who wished to go into the 51st Regiment in order to be near his brother, who was in the 50th. Mr. Foggo's sympathies as an "Anglo-Indian" are evidently catholic. He has gone out into the highways and hedges, and forced them to come in; and if he had only been able to capture Krao, Mr. Barnum, and Sir John Bennett, in addition to the actual bag, he would have had forty-four "supporters of Lord Ripon" whose voices ought to secure the passing of the Ilbert Bill.

In sober earnest there are, in the Aborigines Society's list, exactly three names, of whom Anglo-Indians generally will say, "What on earth are they doing dans ce gaëler-là?" Of these names, one is that of Mr. Spankie, who, though he knows nothing of the circumstances of the districts primarily affected by the Bill, must have had some considerable judicial experience in the North-West Provinces; but the warmth of Mr. Spankie's attachment to Mr. Foggo may be estimated from the fact that he was one of the first to give his name as an opponent of the Ilbert Bill—as denying its expediency, though approving (as most others do), its bare principle—and that he only left the opposition camp when it was decided therein that no compromise could be accepted as satisfactory.

Professor Markby's name was another that surprised most people by its inclusion in the lists of fanatics and persecutors. Not because of his experience—for that is both small, and, being limited to Calcutta, like Sir John Phear's, exactly of the kind likely to be most misleading; but because of his established and well-deserved reputation for soundness of judgment and freedom from bias. Well, we are glad to observe—it is the one pleasing incident in a controversy of almost unmingled disagreeables—that Mr. Markby has virtually come out from among the fanatical crew; though of course, like most other reasonable beings, he still approves of the "principle" to which they profess to hold—the principle of the Queen's Proclamation, which is appealed to alike by opponents and by supporters of the Ilbert Bill. The following just and manly letter—rendered absolutely necessary by the dastardly way in which Mr. Bright had taken advantage of the ignorance of his mob admirers to heap the grossest insults on the English lawyers and the English Civil servants of India—appeared in the Pall Mall Gazette of last Friday night:—

"TO THE EDITOR OF THE 'PALL MALL GAZETTE.'"

"Sir,—I fully appreciate the generous feelings which prompted Mr. Bright's observations, and I sympathise with the ardour with which Mr. Lal Mohun Ghose repelled the imputations which have been cast upon his countrymen. Moreover, if the motives of the opposition to Lord Ripon's policy have been misunderstood, the blame must fall upon those who, at the beginning of the controversy, used language so little consistent with calm and honest conviction. But I should not do justice to my fellow-countrymen in India, nor to myself, if I did not add to what I said yesterday that I do not believe that the opposition to the policy of Lord Ripon has arisen either from motives of personal interest or from a desire to see justice otherwise than impartially administered. Speaking of the lawyers and of the official Europeans in India as a whole, I do not feel the smallest doubt that they have striven, and will continue to strive, to do their duty without any regard to race, colour, or creed. Every official knows that his conduct would be visited with the severest censure from the High Court or the Government if he showed any preference. But I never saw any tendency to display any such preference. On the contrary, the very consciousness of the supreme necessity of impartiality has occasionally led inexperienced officers to display an excessive zeal in bringing European offenders to justice. If it is asked, how then is the opposition to "Ilbert's Bill" to be explained? it must be borne in mind that for the last hundred years we have been loudly proclaiming, by our rules of procedure, that we administer an inferior sort of justice which is good enough for Natives but not good enough for Europeans. This affirmation I believe to be now, and to have long been, false; and one great advantage of Lord Ripon's proposed change is that it will help to remove this unfounded reproach. But we cannot be surprised if there are some who still hesitate to accept the change, and ask why they are to be deprived of a privilege to which, if our previous affirmations had been still true, they would still be entitled.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

"W. MARKBY."

We publish in another column the list of the allies of Mr. Foggo and the Aborigines Protectionists. We have said above that three only, out of the forty-one names, will surprise most of our readers by their appearance in such illustrious company. Of these three we have named two, Mr. Markby and Mr. Spankie; we leave the third unnamed, as an amusing puzzle whereon our readers will exercise their ingenuity—and to leave a locus penitentiæ for anyone of the thirty-nine who may chance to read these words.

MR. GLADSTONE'S PRAISE OF LORD RIPON.

MR. GLADSTONE'S unstinted praise of Lord Ripon has been somewhat misunderstood. It has been taken to mean that the Prime Minister will take upon his own shoulders the faults of the Viceroy, and add to the troubles of the Ministry, which, after three years of power has perceptibly lost favour with the English public, the extra burden of the failure of a man whom nothing could make popular with the English people, and who, in spite of the most brilliant success, would still be regarded with by them suspicion. In England Lord Ripon managed to secure a very remarkable reputation, not only as an unsafe, but as an unlucky politician. He has not been a brilliant success in India; his unsafeness, however, has been powerfully demonstrated, and his unluckiness made patent even to the most forbearing of his friends. When therefore Mr. Gladstone, in speaking of Lord Ripon's three years' career as Viceroy, expressed a hope that future administrations in England would be able to find men as eminently fitted in every way as Lord Ripon for the great post of Viceroy of India; when Mr. Gladstone indulged in this flattery of his faithful follower, he was thinking a great deal more of the awkward position in which he himself stood, than of painting a portrait of Lord Ripon in over-bright colours. If he had been really in earnest in what he said, the time at which he spoke, and the circumstances which induced him to speak, would have made his portrait so entirely a work of his own fancy as to be a caricature. A man of Mr. Gladstone's experience of affairs,—a man who, like the Prime Minister, has had to sit in judgment upon quite a host of men in positions of the highest trust and gravest responsibility,—is not a man to mistake failure for success, or to see in an official who produces embarrassments for his party only a subject for loud laudation. It does not follow that, because Mr. Gladstone has gone out of his way to express a flowery, but not a substantial, confidence in Lord Ripon that he would support his Lordship unflinchingly and at all points; rather, we think, the high terms in which the Prime Minister spoke were, rightly understood, an invitation to Lord Ripon to retire from a post in which he has failed, whilst the Ministry, in the absence of a deliberate, well directed and formal attack upon his lordship and his policy, can venture to praise him with some degree of safety, and without laying themselves open to retort.

If Lord Ripon's administration had been challenged on all points, Mr. Gladstone could not have ventured to lavish praise upon his friend, without immediately tempting some one of the assailants to concentrate public condemnation into some more or less stinging epigram. The circumstances under which Lord Ripon was appointed to the Viceroyalty must be borne in mind. He was a man unacceptable in India and doubted at home. He had held mediocre offices, and in the Alabama affair he had signed a Treaty which no American can think of without laughing, and no Englishman, Conservative or Liberal, without frowning. His appointment, therefore, was not popular, because it was a risk. People at home indeed did not hesitate to regard it as one of those job-looking arrangements. Mr. Gladstone continually perpetrates, and of which the last example is the appointment of a junior member of the English Civil Service, a man who knows absolutely nothing about India, to succeed such an expert as Sir Louis Mallet.

To the public Lord Ripon's career has only been a confirmation of doubts widely felt and unrestrainedly expressed. To the Ministry it is a great deal more than this; it is reducing their selection to a wilful error of judgment; it is a falsification of all their promises as regards India; a breaking down of the hopes of strength they indulged in to be derived from a successful Indian administration; and it is, worse than all, an altogether unlovely disappointment. Yet how can they admit that the public's original surprise at the appointment has been justified? How can they confess that the public fears have proved well-founded, and that their judgment in making the appointment was wholly at fault? So long as desultory attacks only are made upon Lord Ripon, so long will the Ministry feel themselves bound to defend, not the man, but their choice of the man, that is, themselves. But when the attack shall come from both sides of the House, and shall be made by men who are moved by higher than mere party feelings, by men who look to the stability of the Empire, and to the making sure of the foundations of British rule in India—when the attack shall come from Members of the House speaking purely as Englishmen, then Mr. Gladstone will no longer act as an antiphone to Lord Hartington, but will have to choose between giving up Lord Ripon or keeping his own place at the cost of buying the support of the disintegrating Irish vote. When, therefore, we come to analyse Mr. Gladstone's eulogy, if it were an eulogy, we see that whilst he will, up to a certain point, go great lengths to justify his selection of Lord Ripon, his praise of that nobleman is very far, indeed, from meaning that he will maintain him at Calcutta or Simla at all costs. This is, of course, the very easy and superficial view of the matter which has satisfied the supporters of Mr. Ilbert's Bill. Regarded impartially, however, the lines are not so close as to make it impossible to read between them. It would seem that Mr. Gladstone would not object to Lord Ripon's pressing his retirement upon the Home Ministry, and overcoming their politic coyness with a little loyal obstinacy. At least, that is the way in which we read the last of Parliamentary riddles.—Indian Daily News.

THE NATIVE PRESS AND THE ILBERT BILL.

THE systematic effort which has been made by a Calcutta contemporary to convey to the public the impression that Bengal has been saved from a series of Press prosecutions against the will of the Lieutenant Governor, by the intervention of the Supreme Government, and the readiness of the Native Press to adopt this view, are worthy of attention. The resort to astute flattery to convince a few officials at Simla that they alone are the saviours of an oppressed race from the despotic vagaries of the Local Government is an amusing instance of the application of true oriental methods. The reference to a reign of terror shows that amongst a considerable section of the Native Press on that side of India there exists an abject fear that if the existing law (notwithstanding the repealed Vernacular Press Act) is put in force, a large number of persons will be caught within its meshes. The attack on the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal is of a piece with the tactics of those who seem to think that to bring a reckless charge of personal incapacity is a legitimate mode of expressing disapprobation of a policy or a measure. Perhaps "in their absence from contact with public feeling" on all questions, a few of the Viceroy's colleagues may be gratified by the incense burnt by the flatterers in question. To the great mass of the people of this country, however, "the Government of India" is a mere abstraction, and the visible embodiment of administrative authority exists for their eyes far lower even than a lieutenant-governor. Hence it is that a sustained movement to shake the confidence of the masses, not only in the courts, but also in the "hungry adventurers" and "emancipated feudal slaves" who carry on the practical administration of the country, is far more mischievous in its results than any number of diatribes against the invisible authorities who dwell in the clouds of Simla. Hence it also is that it becomes of more practical importance to ascertain how the handful of European officials scattered over the country can be properly supported by the Government they serve, and protected from wilful misrepresentation and unmerited abuse than to discuss the conditions on which a far-off Government can maintain what is commonly called its prestige. The loyalty which is evinced by pretentious efforts to exalt the Viceroy and his colleagues at the expense of a minor administration appears very noble on paper, but, nevertheless, generally deserves to be treated with suspicion, and may safely be attributed in most instances to self-interest.

On a recent occasion we drew attention to the determined effort which has been made to traduce European officials as a class and to stir up hatred against the whole European community. There is a far deeper meaning in this sort of writing than mere journalistic retaliation or race antipathy. Take, for instance, the following extract which we select at random from the Lahore Tribune:—"The children of India consist mainly of Hindus and Mahomedans, their aims, objects, and aspirations are all in common. The present Anglo-Indian agitation against the Native Jurisdiction Bill has taught them they are equal objects of hatred and aspersions to the superior race. It behoves the reformers of both communities to move heaven and earth to dispel the prejudiced notions of their ignorant co-religionists, and to bind the Hindus and Mahomedans into one common bond of brotherly union. The rise or fall of India depends upon this attempt." That a certain section of the Vernacular Press is given to denouncing Englishmen on every possible and impossible occasion is admitted by a Native writer, and a Native journal on this side of India more outspoken than the rest of its contemporaries ventures the opinion that if the Native papers of Bengal and the North-Western Provinces will not control themselves the time is fast approaching when their tongues will have to be curbed under compulsion. When the Englishman published in its columns a silly advertisement couched in terms calculated to give offence to some of our Native friends who have attained to University honours (and afterwards apologised for the inadvertence which had allowed the notice to appear), great satisfaction was expressed because the matter was noticed in Parliament, and because the Under Secretary of State for India almost invited the Government of India to take legal proceedings against the editor of the Englishman under the Penal Code. Some resentment was even expressed when the invitation was not acted upon. We can, therefore, easily estimate the value of the present outcry about the terrorism of the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal when the proposal is that certain Native papers should be prosecuted. Nevertheless, we doubt whether there is any provision of the Penal Code which can be effectually applied to stop the further publication of articles intended to excite race hatred, or defaming whole classes of persons. It is different with attempts to excite feelings of disaffection to the Government. Such attempts are punishable with transportation for life, and so far Mr. Sinnett in his recent letter to the Times, which has already been reproduced in our columns, was right in describing the Vernacular Press Act as substituting "comparatively gentle restraint of warning and suspension" for severer punishments which the courts can inflict.

We have heard a good deal lately about the prestige of the Government of India. To our mind attention may be more profitably directed to the fact that the development of healthy western influences is arrested in proportion to the success of the writers who systematically defame the whole European community. More than this the European public servants who are scattered over the country are to the bulk of the population the visible agents of the British régime, and the determined effort which is now made, to excite hatred against them, and to traduce them is constructively quite as seditious as "attempt to excite feelings of disaffection to the Government established by law." It because such publications cannot be effectually reached by the existing law the matter needs serious attention. Whether the most appropriate form of control would be an addition to the substantive law, or the introduction of a new system of regulation or restraint, or a new method of procedure, we leave to future consideration.—Times of India

THE VOICE OF INDIA. A NEW MAGAZINE INTENDED TO GIVE EXPRESSION TO THE PUBLIC OPINION OF INDIA.

THERE are in England large classes willing and anxious to do justice to India, but they find it very difficult to know how to act. They complain that Indian questions are intricate; that the opinions of official experts are contradictory; and that the people of India are dumb, and do not give expression to their needs. This defect it is now desired to remedy, by publishing monthly in Bombay a magazine somewhat similar in nature to Public Opinion in England, which will provide a compendium of all that is most valuable in the native journals throughout India on the leading topics of the day. It is hoped that the Voice of India will thus give forth a clear sound, interpreting between the rulers and the ruled, and making known the true wishes and feelings of the Indian people.

The Magazine will advocate no views of its own. It will seek only to reflect with care and accuracy the views set forth in the native press. The Indian people are naturally docile and conservative; and it is believed that the writings thus brought before the English public will be found to be characterised by a knowledge of facts, and generally by practical good sense and moderation. No doubt grievances will from time to time be set forth; but it is a policy of prudence no less than of justice to give these grievances a fair constitutional hearing. Accordingly, it is hoped that this publication will be welcomed by all Members of Parliament desirous of dealing with Indian questions, and that the facts thus brought together in a convenient form will be of value to journalists and other public writers. It is specially desired to bring the Magazine before the public in clubs, reading-rooms, libraries, and institutes throughout England, with a view to promote a sustained and intelligent interest in the welfare of our Indian Empire, comprising as it does 220 millions of our fellow-subjects.

MARRIAGE LAW DEFENCE UNION.

The Archbishop of CANTERBURY

The Archbishop of ARMAGH.

VICE-PRESIDENTS:

The Earl of SHAFTESBURY, K.G.

The Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of LINCOLN.

The Lord COLERIDGE, Chief Justice of England

The Right. Hon. A. J. B. BERSFORD-HOPE, M.P.

TREASURERS:

Sir WALTER FARQUHAR, Bart., 18, King-street, St. James's, S.W.

Messrs. HERRIES, FARQUHAR, & Co., 16, St. James's street, S.W.

Messrs. GLYN, MILLS, & Co., Lombard-street, E.C.

This Union is formed to maintain the ancient marriage law of the land, and in particular to resist the legalising marriage with a wife's sister.

Its efforts are directed to organising Committees throughout the United Kingdom, to diffusing information by lectures, publications and otherwise on a subject on which public opinion has been much misled, to encouraging Petitions to both Houses of Parliament, and to directing the attention of the Legislature to the true bearings of the question. A Ladies' Committee has been formed to assist the Union.

The whole principal of which the Marriage Law of this land is based is involved in the acceptance or rejection of the Deceased Wife's Sister Bill. In all countries where the Marriage Law has been relaxed in this one particular, other relaxations have, after some lapse of time, been adopted; in some countries not only may a woman marry her sister's husband, and a man marry his brother's wife, and his wife's niece, or, as in the State of New York, his wife's daughter, but in others a man is freely permitted to marry his niece by blood.

As the operations of the Union are very extensive, Subscriptions and Donations are earnestly requested. All Cheques and Post Office Orders to be crossed either Herries, Farquhar, and Co., or Glyn, Mills, and Co.

It will be obvious that the publications circulated by this Union, although the arguments and considerations contained in them, point to the same conclusion, represent in particulars only the mind of their respective authors.

A list of the publications of the M. L. D. U., and other information, may be obtained gratuitously on application.

SPECIAL SUPPLEMENT TO ALLEN'S INDIAN MAIL

CONTAINING REPORTS OF

THE GREAT EAST-END MEETING TO OPPOSE THE ILBERT BILL; ALSO OF
MR. BRIGHT'S MEETING IN SUPPORT OF LORD RIPON'S POLICY.
WITH THE LETTER OF THE CALCUTTA HIGH COURT ON THE ILBERT BILL.

TUESDAY, AUGUST 7, 1883.

GREAT PUBLIC MEETING OF WORKING MEN IN EAST LONDON TO PROTEST AGAINST THE MEASURE.

A MEETING of the opponents of the Ilbert Bill was held on Thursday, August 2, at the Town-hall, Limehouse; the Hon. E. STANHOPE in the chair. The Limehouse Town-hall is probably the largest place of meeting in the East end; and it was densely packed, large numbers being unable to find seats. The meeting was absolutely an open and public one—tickets being required only for admission to the reserved seats.

“4, Old Burlington-street, W., August 2, 1883.

“Dear Sir,—I regret extremely that I find myself prevented at the last moment from attending your meeting this evening to protest against the Ilbert Bill. I heartily sympathise with the object of the meeting, and I trust that the dangerous speech made by Mr. Bright at St. James' Hall last night, which is characterised by his usual tendency to exaggerate the grievances of subject nationalities at the expense of the interests of his own country, will in no way diminish the effect upon public opinion of the declarations of the High Court of Bengal on the subject, and of all those who, having a practical knowledge of Indian affairs, have unanimously condemned the Bill.—I am, sir, yours faithfully, “H. DE WORMS.

“Roper Lethbridge, Esq., C.I.E., M.A.”

The following telegram was also received from Sir Trevor Lawrence, M.P. :—“Much regret that shortness of notice prevents my attending meeting to protest against the pernicious and dangerous Ilbert Bill.”

Mr. E. STANHOPE, M.P., in opening the proceedings, expressed his regret that Lord George Hamilton, who had promised to be present, and who warmly sympathised with the objects of the meeting, had that morning suffered a domestic affliction which prevented his attendance. Turning to the purpose of the meeting, he went on to say that they were met to discuss a measure which was popularly known under the name of Mr. Ilbert's Bill, and he felt quite sure he might appeal to the speakers who would address them on the subject to deal with the question without such attacks upon opponents as they had seen an instance of at the meeting of the previous day, and with that moderation and calmness which properly befitted the discussion of any Indian question whatever. Up to this time the Committee of Anglo-Indians who had undertaken the opposition to the Bill had been carrying on that opposition with an absolute freedom from party feeling, and with a moderation, calmness, and good temper in this country which did them the highest credit. (Hear, hear.) They might, he thought, also be certainly very firmly convinced that the facts they had to bring forward and the unanswerable arguments by which they could support their case, had made an impression upon the Government. But, unhappily, they had recently found that a deputation of Anglo-Indians, who had argued their cause in the most moderate and calm manner, had been snubbed by the Secretary of State for India, and that all who had opposed this Bill had been attacked by Mr. Bright in terms of very great violence. Still, it seemed to him that the time had come when every man in this country, to whatever party he might belong, who was deeply impressed with a conviction of the great dangers likely to be involved in the pressing forward of this Bill, was bound, if he had even the smallest influence among his fellow-countrymen, to come forward and take an active part in opposition to it. (Hear, hear.) It was not to be supposed for a single moment that any of them in coming there to take part in this meeting were actuated by feelings of opposition to the larger employment of natives in the Civil Service of India. That policy was not the monopoly of any one political party.—(Hear, hear.) He believed that the great charter upon which they now relied was issued in the time of a Conservative Government. (Cheers.) And there had been no more outspoken and candid supporter of that policy than his friend Sir Stafford Northcote, or any man who had tried more persistently to give that policy practical effect than his friend Lord Lytton. (Loud cheers.) All people interested in Indian affairs, to whatever political party they belonged, had always felt that the policy to which they were called to give their adhesion required to be applied in the exceptional circumstances of India with due caution, and the experience of those who thoroughly understood the feelings of the natives of the country. That, he believed, had been the policy of all previous Governors General; but they were now face to face, for the first time, with a proposal of a somewhat different character, which proposed to subject Europeans in the greater part of the country in all criminal cases to the jurisdiction of native magistrates, without taking any adequate safeguards whatever. (Cheers.) Considering the manner in which the Bill had been introduced into the country, Mr. Stanhope observed, no one liked to own that he was the father of it. Mr. Ilbert, whose name would always be associated with it, said it was not his, that he was not responsible for it, and that it was the Government of India which had brought in this Bill. But the Government of India, including Lord Ripon, were only too anxious to get rid of all responsibility, and to say that they brought it in because they were urged to do so by Sir Ashley Eden. That gentleman, however, who spoke with more authority than anyone, was able to say that he was not for one moment responsible, the Bill having been brought forward in the manner and at the time it had been proposed. They had therefore before them a fatherless Bill—a little orphan that no one was willing to claim, and they had to look into its provisions in order to see what merits it possessed. It was in the first place to be observed that the Bill was of very considerable importance to the rich Englishmen in India, but it was a bill of immeasurably greater importance to the poor Englishmen of India. (Cheers.) Who were the people likely to suffer from the action of this Bill? Those Anglo-Indians engaged in the prosecution of the industries of the country, who lived in remote parts of the country far away from the greater number of the European population. The rich Anglo-Indian was in case of difficulty able to obtain legal assistance of a high character, while the poor man would now be subjected to the jurisdiction of native judges in criminal cases without that right, which he had always previously enjoyed, of submitting a case affecting his liberty and personal character to the decision of his countrymen. He had noticed that amongst the arguments of those who were earnest supporters of this measure, there was one in particular to which he would like to direct their attention—viz., that special consideration should be given to the position of the judge. It was urged that it was a great hardship to the native Indian judge, who had worked through the stages of the Civil Service, and who had taken the trouble to acquire legal knowledge, that he should have no jurisdiction over Europeans in India. (Hear, hear.) But it seemed to him that the man they had to think about more particularly was the prisoner. (Loud cheers.) It might be just as well maintained that because the judges in this country did not like to try cases of murder, because everybody knew that they were very disagreeable, those cases should be handed over to an inferior judge. In matters of this kind we thought always of the prisoner; and with regard to the situation in India, it was felt that the prisoner and his wife and family ought to have the best justice that English liberality and fair-play could procure. (Hear, hear.) The second theory which was relied upon in favour of the bill was that of sweeping away all race distinctions in India; it was said that a beginning was to be made in the work of sweeping away all those distinctions—(hear, hear)—and he did not think that this view of the case could have been more strongly put than it was the previous day by a native speaker, Mr. Lalmohun Ghose, who had addressed the meeting at Willis's Rooms. That gentleman had said that in India there was still one law for Europeans and another for natives—(shame)—and that the criminal code was full of invidious distinctions of race. Well, this was quite true, and for a reason which he would at once indicate. When in a case going on before a tribunal in India, an Englishwoman was obliged to go and give evidence, she could be brought there by compulsion, she could be forced to answer every question that every cross-examining counsel could put to her, but a native woman could refuse to go to the court. (Hear, hear.) An exceptional law protected the native woman; her prejudices and the feelings of her countrymen were respected, and she was not compelled to come into court. (Question.) If he were asked what this had to do with the question, he must say that it seemed to him to be the very vital essence of it. (Cheers.) There were undoubtedly distinctions between race. We protected the native women of India in the court of law, we protected the idols of the people of India, we protected the temples of the people of India, and we protected the other customs and feelings of the people of India, and in every possible way we respected the races, the castes, and the religions of the natives of India throughout the whole of that country. (Cheers.) In summing up this part of the case, what he had to say to them was this; that if they were going to carry out the principle for which Mr. Lalmohun Ghose contended, they would have to sweep away a hundred distinctions in favour of the native for one in favour of the European. (Hear, hear.) However, he would pass from this point, because neither in India nor in this country were we governed by pure theory. We were governed by practical considerations. If we were going to look into it very critically we should know perfectly well that our whole government in India was one of the greatest anomalies in the whole world, and that of all the difficult and intricate questions with which the Government had to deal the most delicate and intricate was that of the relations between Englishmen and natives. He would venture to say that when any legislation was proposed in this country or in India which in any way affected relations between Englishmen and natives in India, we ought to hold fast to two cardinal considerations, which to his own mind ought to influence us in the most important degree. The first of these was that we must secure the safety of our dominion in India, and he did not think that anyone had put this point more forcibly than a Governor General whose name was entitled to the highest respect in every assembly of Englishmen—the late Lord Lawrence.—(Cheers.) Lord Lawrence had said that the truest kindness to the natives of India was to take steps to secure the continuance and the strength of our rule. (Hear, hear.) As for his second cardinal condition, it was that they ought, in dealing with any such intricate and delicate question as that to which he had alluded, pay the greatest possible regard to the feelings and knowledge of those Anglo-Indians who had had experience in India. Those Anglo-Indians possessed a knowledge of the customs and of the prejudices of the people of India which no other person could have, however much they might read about India and in that way study the country. Well, he would ask them whether in this particular case the feelings, knowledge, and experience of Anglo-Indians had been appealed to for a single moment in support of the Bill. (“No.”) He might go further and say—and this was a point which had been brought very prominently forward during the last few days—that there was not the smallest evidence that any demand existed on the part of the natives for any such Bill as that which was now before the Government of India. (Hear, hear.) He held in his hand a letter written by a native inhabitant of India which put the case with so very much force that they would permit him to read two or three sentences from it. The native said “that Mr. Ilbert's proposal to extend the jurisdiction over European British subjects by natives was certainly impolitic and ill-timed. It was calculated to do more harm than good to the furtherance of native interests. It might satisfy ideal claims of justice, but, on the other hand, it would excite race feeling and widen the gulf which unhappily existed between Europeans and natives.” (Hear, hear.) And then he went on to say, “Legislative measures like the one under consideration should consult the wishes and feelings of those whom they concern. The European community is averse to it, and the native community has not demanded it. Why, then, introduce a measure which will do no practical good, but incalculable harm, by generating friction between the two races—a deplorable result in my humble opinion?” (Cheers.) Well, who had been consulted in this matter? They all knew that the class of Englishmen in India who were not officials had never been consulted at all. They knew perfectly well what the result of appeals to the official Englishmen had been. Originally the Local Governments were consulted, and they sent back answers to the proposal of Lord Ripon which were taken by Lord Ripon to imply some adhesion to the principle for which he contended, and thereupon he introduced the Bill. He had sent round the Bill to the Local Governments. We had not yet got their opinions in this country, but what we heard beyond any reasonable doubt was this, that the Local Governments in India were almost unanimously opposed to it. (Cheers.) And one of the things of which he must complain was this, that while they sent home from India a telegram soon enough to explain in their own language, and as he ventured to say, entirely contrary to the facts that were before them, the debate that took place in the Indian Council, because they thought it would tell in favour of the Bill, they were abstaining day by day from sending the answers of the Local Governments; and when they got them he supposed it would be in the same sort of form that they got the debate in the Indian Council. (Hear, hear.) He must say that the Anglo-Indian community had been treated most cruelly, when they were told yesterday at a meeting in Willis's Rooms that it was open to them to go to the House of Commons and to submit a motion condemning the Bill, he thought he had never heard a more unfair observation, because they knew perfectly well the reason why no motion had been submitted. He might say for himself that the reason why he had submitted no motion to the House of Commons had been, in the first place, because he had been most rigidly careful up to the present time not to make it in the smallest degree a question between parties in this country. (Cheers, and interruption.) Until the meeting of Wednesday, it had never been a question between parties. (Hear, hear.) In the second place he had desired above all things to do what the supporters of this Bill had always urged them to do—he had desired to wait as long as he could in order that the fullest information might be before the country, and that Lord Ripon himself might have the fullest opportunity of considering the opinions that had been expressed. (Cheers.) But there was another party that had been consulted—the judges of the High Court, and the judges of the High Court, who were specially qualified to express an opinion upon this subject of jurisdiction, had pronounced against this Bill in a paper which, he thought, would long be remembered as one of the ablest State papers ever sent to this country. It seemed therefore to be this, that in the opinion of all those, or almost every one of those, most qualified to judge from their knowledge of the country, and from the experience that they had of the feelings and prejudices of the natives, it appeared to be felt and admitted that this Bill would not do the smallest atom of good to the natives of India, and that it might do enormous mischief to the true interests and to the future of India.—(Cheers.) He should venture to say in concluding the remarks which he had ventured to submit that if they desired at that moment, sitting in that room, to take steps for securing the stability of their rule in India, then ask that this Bill might be dropped. (Hear, hear.) If they desired to develop the true interests of India, and to extend into the remotest parts of the country the application of English capital to industrial undertakings which were calculated, to do enormous good to the country, then demand that this policy might be reversed. (Cheers.) And if above all they desired that the difficulties and animosities between races should be gradually and speedily got rid of, and that both Englishmen and natives should endeavour to be amicably united for the common purpose of promoting the interests of the Empire, then insist upon the withdrawal of the Ilbert Bill. (Cheers.)

Sir A. ARBUTHNOT who was received with cheers, moved—“That this meeting disapproves of the Bill now before the Indian Legislature, commonly called the Ilbert Bill, and desires to move Her Majesty's Government to take measures for the withdrawal of the Bill.” He reminded the audience that the vast empire in India was vast not only in extent of area, but in population, 250,000,000 people being the population, which was ruled by what was, by comparison, a handful of Englishmen. (Hear, hear.) If the history of India were considered it would be seen that England had ruled India in a manner of which there had been few instances in the history of the world—for the government had been devoted to the great object, in intention and act, to the benefit of the subject people. (Cheers.) It was not necessary to defend the justice of the administration of India, although, as might readily be conceived, the government of such a country was no easy matter; and one of the most important things which was to be kept in view—looking to the position of the British in India—was, that nothing should be done, and no measures should be taken which might impair the relations between the British and Indian peoples. (Cheers.) Care, in fact, must be taken, that while the British conferred the blessings of peace and prosperity, and gave India all the advantages which spring from the discoveries of science, they should not weaken their own supremacy, which, as the greatest administrator India had ever seen, the late Lord Lawrence, said, “was essential to the well-being of the people of India.” (Cheers.) Englishmen were especially bound to abstain from bringing forward any measures which would be likely to endanger the position, and even the safety of the Englishmen and English women, who were scattered over that vast empire of India; and the retention of the privilege which the English possessed of not being amenable to the jurisdiction, in criminal cases, to the native courts was perfectly compatible with the liberal policy of the administration of India—“liberal,” he meant, in a non-political sense, but liberal in the way in which the people of India had been governed. (Cheers.) The question of the retention of this privilege was very fully discussed previous to the code of 1872, and the settlement of the question in the retention of this privilege was accepted by both Englishmen and natives as a perfectly fair and just decision. (Cheers.) But now, it appeared, if this Ilbert Bill became law, this settlement of 1872 would be altogether undone, and for this change there was no administrative necessity whatever. [He was proceeding to quote Mr. John Bright's words, and on the mention of that statesman's name there were some groans and cheers. Both were repeated, until there was a thorough demonstration, and from that moment the seeming harmony in the meeting was ended.] The words to which the speaker called attention was the statement of Mr. Bright that the Bill was a small measure and Sir Alexander said that was so for the present, and that the number of functionaries who would exercise power under it would be small. But this was true only of the present time, inasmuch as changes would come which would alter the present circumstances. He denied that the people of India sought for this measure. A small but noisy section had taken it in hand now the idea had been put into their heads, but the great body of the native community were completely indifferent to it. He then referred to the speech of Mr. Forster, and said he agreed with that statesman as to the great importance of the local self-government resolution—but in a sense very different from that in which Mr. Mr. Forster regarded it as important. He concluded by reading a letter he had received from a high native official, who wrote respecting the present administration of India:—“I am afraid the measure is at least half a century in advance of its time. I only hope if introduced it will not throw back the cause. It is strange, too, the Government should seek to commence at the wrong end. Why not first enlarge the legislative councils and give them more powers? The Education Commission, too, I fear is another blunder. It is setting missionaries and natives by the ears. We are never satisfied with what we have but must do things by leaps and jumps. I begin to feel that a five years' tenure of power is a terrible temptation to a man to do something which should be essentially his own.”

Mr. ROGER LETHBRIDGE, C.I.E., in seconding the motion, said that his only claim to say a few words in support of the resolution was that he had spent many years of his life in India, that he had learned to love that country and its people, and that he felt certain that this iniquitous Bill, if persevered in, would prove the ruin, not only of the English in India, but of India itself. He wished first to denounce with the utmost indignation the imputation that had been made upon Anglo-Indians that they opposed the Bill from the base motive of jealousy of the natives. They desired to see the natives educated and enlightened, they desired to see them largely and usefully employed by the Indian Government; but for the sake of the natives themselves, as well as for the sake of the empire at large, they did not desire to see them placed in positions for which they were entirely disqualified, however high their character and education, by reason of their social customs. When native magistrates broke through the shackles of caste—under which the poor low-caste man was not allowed to stand on the same carpet with the Brahmin, even in a Court of Justice—when they learnt to look upon women as the equals of men, when they married one woman only and respected her as their equal; then, but not till then, would he and those who agreed with him be prepared to hear of their sitting in judgment on Englishwomen. In the next place, the people directly affected by this measure were the few native magistrates who would obtain this jurisdiction on the one side, and the whole body of Englishmen and Englishwomen residing in the rural districts, on the other side. The vast bulk of the natives neither knew nor cared about it; whilst the most liberal and most intelligent section of the native community deplored it, as surely causing hatred between the native and the Englishman. A renowned orator had uttered an unworthy sneer against them on the previous day because in their memorial to the Secretary of State they stated that the Englishmen and Englishwomen who would be affected by the Bill belonged almost entirely to the poorer classes, but he challenged Mr. Bright and every one of the supporters of the Ilbert Bill to disprove the statement. It was not the wealthy planter or the influential official who had anything to fear, at least for the present, from the Bill. But in the rural districts that would come under the operation of the Bill there were thousands of industrious, intelligent English working men, who were the very bone and sinew of the commercial enterprise of the country, who worked the railways which had proved such a boon to India, and whose skill and intelligence guided the manual labour of native workmen, and it was against those men that false charges would be brought, whose wives and daughters would be subject to intimidation and extortion, and who would ultimately be driven out of the country, to the ruin of its commerce and to the disgrace of the English name. The assertion that only a few English men and women would be touched by the Bill was an argument in its favour, but even were the number few, which he denied, he contended that by driving them out of the country they would entirely destroy the great nascent industries of India, for no capitalists would invest capital in a country where their employés were not secure. (Hear, hear.) It was urged by the supporters of the Bill that justice must be done, even if the whole of the commerce of India and of England were destroyed; that if the native magistrates were qualified to exercise jurisdiction, the power should be given to them, even at the risk of lowering every workman's wages in India and in England. To that he assented without the smallest hesitation. But he would ask any one who had read the petition, which was signed by nearly every Englishwoman in India and which was in the hands of many present that evening, whether it could be said that native magistrates, however high their character and ability, were qualified to judge of the actions and motives of Englishwomen. It was an undeniable fact that native magistrates had been brought up under a social system that held women to be distinctly inferior to men, and under such circumstances it would be a monstrous thing that they should deliberately change the law of the land in order to render Englishwomen liable to be dragged up for trial, perhaps on the most humiliating charges, before magistrates who were entirely unable to understand or to appreciate their actions or their motives, and whose own wives were exempted from such humiliation by a special privilege, which they would not consent to part with. (Cheers.)

On the CHAIRMAN rising to put the resolution, a gentleman (understood to be the chairman of the Tower Hamlets Radical Association) advanced from the body of the hall towards the platform, and demanded to be allowed to submit an amendment. This gentleman (Mr. LE LUREZ) was supported by three or four knots of noisy persons, evidently well-drilled and organised; for from this point the proceedings were conducted in the midst of incessant uproar, although when the resolution was put, only twenty-three hands were counted against it, out of a meeting estimated to consist of at least 1,200 persons.

The CHAIRMAN explained that, as the programme of the meeting must be proceeded with, dissentients would have the opportunity of expressing their views, by voting in the negative to the resolution. He then put the resolution with the result that it was carried by the enormous majority already mentioned.

Colonel MALLESON, who spoke amongst continued interruptions, said:—"When I came down here to-night I felt that an appeal made to the skilled workmen of England on behalf of their brethren in India would not fail to elicit sympathy and support. For, as Mr. Roper Lethbridge has told you in words as eloquent as they are convincing, it is the cause of the British working-man in India which we are met to advocate this evening. It is the cause of the working-man, which has been assailed by this pernicious measure introduced by a Liberal Viceroy, and supported by all the influence of a Liberal Cabinet. Gentlemen, when a few days ago I heard Lord Kimberley, in words for the curtness of which he apologised, refuse the prayer of the deputation which waited upon him in the hope to secure the British working man in India from the oppression which threatened him, I could not help wondering at the face with which he and his colleagues dared to apply to themselves the epithet "liberal." A more illiberal, a more oppressive measure than this, a measure more grinding upon British industry, was never proposed by any despotic Government in the world. And for whose advantage is this baneful measure introduced? I could conceive that if the native population of India were labouring under restrictions, and it were proposed to remove those restrictions, that the generous hearts of the English people would at once respond to the cry. But, on the present occasion, there is not even a pretence that there is any restriction to be removed. What is wanted is a power to ride over the prejudices of Englishmen, to exercise over the working classes of our country a power to plunder and despoil under the shadow of legal authority. And who are they who demand this power? Not the people of Hindustan, not the cultivated classes of the Northern, western and Southern India. No—these men are all against the measure. The Muhammadans of the Panjab have gone so far as to protest against it. No: the men who ask for this measure are the shallow, flippant, noisy natives of Bengal. And who are these Bengalees? They are the men whom, sunk for ages in misery, we rescued from the grasp of the oppressor, whom we nurtured, educated, and reformed. They are those, whom, before our arrival in India, the Natives of Central and Northern India did not recognise as men, but placed on a lower level than the beasts of the field. And these are the men whom we rescued and educated, who now turn against their benefactors, who are now plotting a conspiracy of which they will be the first victims. The people of India will stand much; they will stand the supremacy of men of tried ability, they will stand the predominance of a great and farsighted nation; but they will never rest tranquil under the supremacy now proposed to be conferred upon those who were hewers of wood and drawers of water under the rule of their ancestors. It is on behalf then of your own countrymen and of the Natives of India alike that I ask you to combine to reject this bill.

Mr. DAWSON, who seconded the resolution, said that upon hearing the sounds with which the opponents of the resolution endeavoured to stifle all discussion, he asked himself whether England, like Rome, was to be saved by the hissing of geese. Lord Lawrence, whose opinion had already been quoted, had said the English dominion in India was the best thing for the inhabitants of that country. (Cheers.) He was certainly in favour of justice being done, but what proof was there that injustice had been done under the present regime? (Cheers and interruption.) He would say at once that he would not sit down until those who had convened the meeting, and were opposed to the Bill, asked him to do so. (Cheers and more interruption.) He was astonished that any body of Englishmen should imagine that the din of unreasonable sound, and imitations of the cries of humble beasts could support a case. (Laughter, and cries of "Give us fair play.") In all the meetings that had been held, and in all the speeches that had been made, whether by Native gentlemen or Englishmen upon this bill, there had not been one statement brought forward to show that under the present regime any injustice had taken place. Indeed, there was the authority of Lord Ripon himself that there was no immediate necessity for this Bill. (Cheers.) It was impossible to argue with some gentlemen about this matter, because there was no common ground of argument.—(A Voice: "We want fair play," and renewed interruption. Three cheers for Gladstone called for and given, accompanied by hooting and groans.) Many of those who supported this Bill openly admitted that they would be glad to see India dissevered from us to-morrow. (Interruption.) If they were in favour of giving up our Indian Empire altogether, let them say so like men. (Loud cries of "No." More interruption. A Voice: "You won't let us say anything.") They had had the chance of holding up hands against the Bill. There was a chance of voting; what more could they want? At the meeting at Willis's Rooms last night no amendment was proposed by the opponents of the Bill. (A voice: "Mr. Hyndman proposed an amendment.") That amendment was simply about the expenses of the Indian troops, and it was proposed by Mr. Hyndman, a Radical, who was in favour of the Bill. (Cheers and interruption.) If they wanted to lose India let them support the Ilbert Bill; if, on the contrary, they wished to maintain our Indian Empire, which we had won with so much valour and governed with so much statesmanship and skill, then let them beware of voting for any measure which really imperilled the sovereignty of that country. (Cheers.) If we looked back upon Indian history to find what was the position of the Natives before we conquered the country, we should understand how much India itself had gained by our rule; and the very class that had done most to benefit India was the class that would suffer most under this Bill. He did not lay so much stress upon the opposition given to this Bill by the official classes of India, as upon that given by the non-official class, men who went out there with their capital and intellect and strength, the wealthy planter and the poor navvy, the poor railway workman, the guard, the porter, the men who tilled the fields, these were the men who had done good to India—(cheers)—and they had done good in this manner; they had gone far away from the large towns, and from the centres of population, hundreds and thousands of miles up into the country, on the frontier, in the lonely parts of India, where there were very few other white men, taking with them Saxon energy, and English and European capital. It was this very class that it was now proposed to put at the mercy of a race totally different to our own. The Bill itself was a small thing compared with the effect that its introduction had had. It had opened up old wounds that had been closing up: the evils of the Mutiny had been forgotten: old race hatreds were being quenched; people were beginning to be friendly one with another, when this Bill is introduced reminding us of the play scene in "Hamlet," where Lucianus pours poison into the sleeper's ear. In sowing these race hatreds and dissensions they were committing an act of injustice to our English fellow subjects and imperilling the very existence of our Indian Empire. Mr. Dawson on resuming his seat was greeted with loud cheers, an ineffectual attempt being made to drown them.

The CHAIRMAN put the resolution, and declared it carried.

Colonel PRENDERGAST WALSH said: May it please the chair and gentlemen, a small band of persons appears determined to prevent the speakers from being heard. This is un-English, and I would claim from you a hearing on the grounds that I am an old soldier who passed many years of my life in India, have ever been on friendly terms with the natives, have mingled amongst them, know their manners and customs, and feel that having sat on the Bench in India as a magistrate I know the real merits of this burning question. An honourable gentleman in the hall interrupts me. Is he afraid of living evidence?—why, he would be the first to refuse to be tried by twelve natives! Surely the testimony of persons who have passed the best years of their lives in India, and who have held official positions in that country ought to weigh against such ignorant statements as were made yesterday at Willis's Rooms by persons, many of whom have only read and heard about Hindostan. Well, now, the persons who are trying to pass this Bill are, in reality, the worst enemies of 250 millions of Her Majesty's subjects at the opposite extremity of the globe, and why? Because they got up and are responsible for this agitation which has raised up ill-feeling, and created, in a time of peace, race animosities that may end in disorder, if not in blood. (Great cheering, and cheers and groans from a small party on right of hall.) It is too late an hour for me, now past 10.30, to go into the history of this controversy, suffice it to say that the "measure" was not asked for, nor wanted, and that its supporters admit that no immediate necessity exists for its proposal, while it dis-mays English men and women in India. For many years Conservative and Liberal administrators discussed the question whether it was advisable to allow up-country magistrates in India to have criminal jurisdiction over Europeans in the Mofussil. Men of both shades of political views agreed that Englishmen in India had a privilege that no Government ought to deprive them of, viz., the right of trial by their peers if residing beyond the limits of the cities of the three Presidencies. The history of the power given to native judges and magistrates in India, and the point where such should stop can be related in a few words. We won that vast empire by the chivalry and the devotion of your ancestors. We secured it by force of arms, and having done so we resolved to retain it by the establishment of law and peace, by education and improvements, and by the aid of the people amongst whom our civil administrators and soldiers were thenceforth to live. What was our first step? We called into existence a number of courts, civil and criminal, and we placed over many of these tribunals the very men whom we had conquered, and we educated others for the Bench; and as far as was safe, we gave these judicial persons large powers. These courts rapidly grew, and native judges were permitted to try certain civil suits between Englishmen and natives (because civil decisions could be reversed if in error), while they could try also all classes of civil cases to certain amounts between themselves, as well as deal with native criminals, committing them for trial or sentencing them to such periods of imprisonment, as the acts and regulations allowed. Ultimately, we gave native magistrates criminal jurisdiction in the cities of Calcutta, Bombay, and Madras, over our own countrymen, the Government of the day, considering that in these great cities the presence of the judges of the High Courts, the Bar, the press and the public would form a conjoint security for the fair trial of Englishmen, and that if there were irregularity, injustice, or oppressive decisions given by native magistrates against our countrymen, that a "writ of habeas corpus" could immediately issue, and that a prisoner, in a few hours, could have it decided if his commitment were just. If unjust, then this remedial writ would give immediate relief and discharge; but if the decision was correct, the native magistrate's sentence obtained the endorsement of an English judge; no oppression, consequently, could occur at Presidency towns. But Government, when arranging these matters, rightly declined to extend the criminal jurisdiction of native magistrates over Europeans who resided far away, perhaps hundreds of miles distant from the High Courts, simply because an Englishman convicted in the Mofussil could not immediately appeal against the sentence. Where no railways existed, and even still in some places days, weeks, and months might pass over before an appeal could be made, and it would often be impossible for a poor, hard-working Englishman to obtain money to pay counsel for moving the court. One hour's imprisonment in a criminal gaol would taint an Englishman's character in the native eye, and as it was, and is, well known that oaths and verdicts can be bought in India for four annas, equal to 6d., or be procured by favour, the rulers in India of a past day refused to give a full power to these gentlemen who might abuse it, and whose wrongful acts, owing to distance, the poverty of the prisoner, or other causes, might not be challenged, while the liberty of the accused and convicted persons might be restrained, although innocent. Well, Englishmen, and especially Englishwomen, far away up-country, still believe that the safety of themselves, their sons and daughters, from false charges depend upon their "privilege" being retained. (Cheers.) I ask you not to aid Lord Ripon in destroying the rights of your countrymen; mind you, men and women of your own class, who, far away from their dear old homes and happy recollections, by industry and labour in a burning and deadly climate struggle to maintain their children, and who uphold the name and honour of England amid an alien race. But the Bill hits the non-official class and successful settlers in India, as well as the poor workman. Many a planter and many a man identified with industry in that country, men who coming from the middle classes, and numbers also sprung originally from English workshops, have made fortunes abroad, and their example has aided Government when our administrators have been pressing western ideas upon Asiatics. These men were often made magistrates, but by this Bill no more of their order will be honoured by a Commission of the Peace, and they are to be exiles from the Bench. The Bill is a qualifying and disqualifying one. Only four classes will, under it, be eligible for magistracies, and all of these classes must be Government Servants. So Lord Ripon wants to clothe natives with judicial power over Englishmen, while in the same Bill he will rudely strip the future honest self-made Englishman of the non-official class of the honour of a seat on the Bench, for by this Bill the planter and every Englishman who is not a servant of the Crown, is declared outside the "pale" and cannot receive that compliment which we formerly paid to deserving English subjects of the Queen who supported law and order in the East, and who rose to wealth by merit. We as a nation are not alone in refusing criminal power over Englishmen to native magistrates; all western nations refuse to allow their people to be so tried, on the grounds that injustice would follow, and that such a policy would destroy the administration of the country. (Cheers and interruption.) Now, one word more and I shall cease. It was yesterday asserted that this measure was promised fifty years ago. This is simply false, and cannot be shown. It was stated that in 1833 a clause was inserted in the charter given to the old East India Company that we would protect the natives from "insult and outrage." Granted. And it is foolishly pleaded that the refusal to allow them to try us is an insult. Now this Bill of 1833 never touched that question at all, i.e., the trial of Europeans. The clause 87 of same Bill was relied upon by Mr. Bright. That clause only ruled that natives were not to be disbarred from office. Well they were not disbarred since, but were constantly admitted to Government's service. But what I want you to hear is this, that the Bill of 1833, which Mr. Bright misrepresents, did not repeal the regulations and Acts that made it unlawful for natives to try Europeans in the Mofussil. (Cheers.) The proof that the natives acquired no promise by that Bill that they should try us, is patent by the fact that the Bill now before us is to do that which the Bill of 1833 never did do. The law from 1833 to 1858, and since, remained the same. The English Government took over India in 1858 with all her laws, liabilities, advantages, and solemn engagements, and the proclamations of 1858—I heard it read in Bombay—did not cancel the privilege we had and have in India of trial by our peers in the Mofussil. This I boldly assert as substantially and actually true. It is a wicked thing of Mr. Bright to say or insinuate that Her Majesty promised to cancel the privilege for which I plead, for such is the meaning of his words. It is vile, by imputation to assert that the Queen broke her Royal word. (Loud and prolonged cheers.) Her Majesty simply said in the great proclamation that she would admit to office without reference to creed or race all natives duly qualified by education, ability, and integrity, but there was the saving clause, "So far as may be." (Cheers and groans.) This promise has been amply redeemed by numberless appointment of natives to good salaried positions, judicial and otherwise. High advisers of former Governments have not considered that the time has yet arrived to admit them "so far" as to give them power over Englishmen when on the Mofussil bench. On the road they have got, and "so far as may be" they sit on the magisterial bench of presidency cities and deal with Europeans. (Cheers.) Their ability to fathom English character is disputed, and from personal knowledge I say they cannot judge us. The official records of Indian courts are studded with the convictions of native officials for bribery and corruption, and, I regret to say, that native judicial officers appear also in the criminal calendar. (Hear, hear.) So the time has not yet arrived, and it is, I regret to think, very far distant, when with safety we can give full criminal power in all places to native magistrates to deal judicially with Europeans in the Mofussil. (Cheers.) The language and arguments used to induce Government to break faith with Englishmen are misleading. Mr. Bright says the Queen bound herself in the proclamation of 1858 to give this measure. But I say the Queen's proclamation binds Her Majesty to us not to grant it. If we had in 1858, and since, the privilege we claim, and which this Bill seeks to cancel, do not the following words quoted at yesterday's meeting, pledge the Throne and Government to us:—"We hold ourselves bound to the natives of our Indian territories by the same obligations of duty which bind us to all our other subjects," and we are the "other subjects." Well, was it not, and is it not, an obligation of duty to assure and maintain to us a privilege long ago granted, never forfeited, and never cancelled, either by "acts" or "proclamations," and never promised to be repealed by the Queen? The obligation of duty remains, for the proclamation of 1858 did not promise to repeal our rights; the act of 1833 did not even foreshadow it, and it consequently is false and base, to attempt to put promises in the mouth of our gracious Queen, which were never uttered, nor intended to be made. In conclusion, I have to propose a vote of thanks to Mr. Stanhope for his able and manly conduct in the chair. (Loud cheers.)

The motion, having been seconded by Mr. G. J. BOOTH, was adopted. The proceedings terminated amid uproarious counter demonstrations from the organised clique who had endeavoured to obstruct; but the vast majority of those present were evidently in sympathy with the views of the speakers, and "God Save the Queen" was vigorously sung in chorus as the dense crowd gradually dispersed.

LORD RIPON'S INDIAN POLICY.

ON Wednesday afternoon, August 1, a meeting was held at Willis's Rooms in support of Lord Ripon's policy in India. Loring, Sir Arthur Hayter, M.P., Mr. Charles Hancock, Sir James Marshall (late Chief Justice of the Gold Coast Colony), and Mr. O'Connor Power, M.P. Amongst the audience were observed a number of Hindoo gentlemen, both on the platform and in the body of the room.

Mr. BRIGHT, on entering, was received with enthusiastic cheering, most of those present rising and waving their hats. Having formally taken the chair he rose and said: Ladies and Gentlemen, I have been requested by the committee who have called this meeting to occupy the chair, and perhaps you will permit me to make a few observations on the question about which we are assembled, before I call upon the speakers who will ask you to agree to, I think, two resolutions. The subject which we are about to consider appears to me, and I think, appears to everybody who looks at it for the first time, to be one of no great moment, and yet we find that as a result, a great discussion in India and in this country has grown up upon it, and it now appears to be a question of great importance. In India, as most of you will be aware who have read the newspapers of late, and the more so if you have read the Indian papers—in India the question has given rise to not a little clamour and not a little discord, and in this country, amongst persons connected with India, we have seen that there is a great divergence of opinion. Last week, I think on Thursday last, a deputation of a formidable character sought an interview with Lord Kimberley, who is now Secretary of State for India, and they told him that they represented not less than 700 persons who are interested in this question, of whom they said 450 had had the honour of being employed in the service of the Queen in the Indian Empire, while 250 were otherwise connected with India, but had not been in the public service. If 700 persons took this interest in the question, and could take the view which the deputation were appointed to represent to the Indian Secretary of State, we may be quite sure that the question has assumed an importance which justifies our discussing it here to-day. What is the cause of all this clamour and discord in India, and of this discussion here? The cause is a very small Bill introduced into the Legislative Council of India, and which goes by the name of Mr. Ilbert's Bill, because Mr. Ilbert, a legal member of the Council, introduced it, and is in his department in some sort specially responsible for it. I asked a gentleman very intimately connected with affairs in India if he could give me very briefly an account of what this Bill was to do, and I will try to convey to you the ideas which he conveyed to me. He said he thought the result of it would be, if introduced in its present shape, that it would admit three or four natives of India, lawyers, magistrates, or judges, to the exercise of certain powers which at present they did not possess, and that these three or four were members of what is termed the Covenanted Civil Service; that they were Indian gentlemen, natives of India, who had come over to this country and been educated here, and going back to India had entered the Covenanted Civil Service. With regard to these increased powers, with which they were to be entrusted, they were to occupy a certain rank, and they could only have these powers and these appointments after some years of service, and then, to be equal with Englishmen also, they must be in a service of what he termed the same grade; and then after all this they were to be admitted to have the same powers, exercised with the same limitations, which are given to and operate upon Englishmen in the same position. I must inform you that at present in the three principal cities of India—in Calcutta, in Madras, and in Bombay—the native judges have all the power, which it is proposed by this Bill to give to those few judges who exercise their authority in the country apart from the three presidential cities. We have never heard that any harm has arisen from the exercise of these powers in these cities, but it must be borne in mind further, that of all the population of India who are English subjects of the Queen, exclusive of the army, I suppose more than one-half, I believe three-quarters, of them live in Calcutta, Madras, or Bombay; and, therefore, this Bill which men are so alarmed about, will not have the slightest effect upon three-quarters of the English population of India, exclusive of the army, but only on one-quarter who live in other cities and towns and in the country districts of the Indian Empire. That appears to me to be a matter of great importance; it reduces the magnitude of the Bill and the effect of it, and enables us to judge it, I think, with greater facility and to measure the magnitude of the issue which is placed before us. But what the opponents of the Bill say is this: "This is only the beginning." That is exactly what people said in this country about sixty years ago, when it was proposed to disfranchise places like Gattor or Old Sarum, and to enfranchise Manchester and Leeds. (Cheers.) It is only the beginning, and that is a very serious thing if it is the beginning of evil, but if it be a beginning of what is necessary and good, it is not an argument against this Bill. (Cheers.) They say that although now there may be only three or four admitted to these increased powers, to in future there will be more and more. Well, I hope that is true—(hear, hear, and cheers)—but I regret to say that the increase must be very small for a long period, and must come about by degrees; but it is most melancholy to think that amongst us such difficulties should have been interposed. Those gentlemen in future who mean to join the Covenanted Civil Service and get into the positions of these judges must come over from India to this country, they must be educated here, they must go back and suffer all the inconveniences of such a regulation, they must be involved in all the cost of an English education through several years—these are a few of the things which will be thrown upon any native of India who comes here. The numbers of these, you will see, necessarily will be small, and they will increase by only very small degrees. But now, having stated this, which I think is a fair statement of the effects of the Bill, if it become law, I should like to ask you what ground there is for the clamour which has been raised, especially when I call to mind the various promises that have been made to the natives of India during the last fifty years. In 1833 there passed an Act of Parliament—just fifty years ago—to prolong or renew the charter, now dead, of the East India Company. I will read you two paragraphs from that charter, and you will see what was the temper of the House of Commons at that time. Section 85 runs in this way: "And whereas the removal of restrictions on the intercourse of Europeans within the said territory will render it necessary to provide against any mischief or dangers that may arise therefrom, be it therefore enacted that the Governor-General in Council shall and he is hereby required by the laws and regulations to provide with all convenient speed for the protection of the natives from insult or outrage." I was not aware until the other day of the existence of that clause, but it brings to my mind a picture which I would gladly not look upon that the natives of India at that time were liable, according to the view of the Act of Parliament of the Government, to insult and outrage from the English subjects of the Queen living in India. The next clause but one bears more directly upon this question. Section 87 reads thus:—"And be it enacted that no Native of the said territories, nor any natural born subject of Her Majesty resident therein shall, by reason only of his religion, race, birth, descent, colour, or any of them, be disabled from filling any place, office, or employment under the said company." Now, that was the law from 1833 to 1858, the time of the suppression of that great and calamitous Mutiny. After the Mutiny was over, Her Majesty the Queen was advised by her Ministers—I presume the Ministers of the party not now in power—the late Lord Derby, I think was Prime Minister at that time—and this is a portion of the proclamation—the magnificent and noble proclamation—which was then issued in the name of the Queen to all her subjects in India:—"And it is our further will that, so far as may be, our subjects, of whatever race or creed, be freely and impartially admitted to offices in our service, the duties of which they may be qualified by their education, ability, and integrity duly to discharge." The Queen says:—"We hold ourselves bound to the natives of our Indian territories by the same obligations of duty which bind us to our other subjects; and these obligations, by the blessing of Almighty God, we shall faithfully and conscientiously fulfil." (Cheers.) Well, then, after reading these passages, what are we to say of the clamour which is now raised in regard to this Bill, diminished, as I have shown you, to such small form from such magnificent dimensions? If this Bill had never been heard of, if under Lord Ripon's Government, and under the advice of Mr. Ilbert and other members of the Council, this Bill had not been brought forward, the natives of India could always have pointed to these paragraphs in the Act of 1833 and the proclamation of 1858, and thought of the freedom which was there promised as long delayed, and said, "Yet we believe it will come, and we are filled with hope that a better time is in prospect for our countrymen." But if after this discussion, after the clamour which had been raised in India, after the fulminations in a certain class of newspapers—(hear, hear)—in this country, after the deputation representing 700 persons, Englishmen who have been connected with India, and 450 of whom have been in the service of the Queen; if, after all this conflict, Lord Ripon is permitted to withdraw this Bill then the hope of the people of India will be blasted, and instead of hope their souls be filled with despair. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) And what would that despair mean? It would mean that with the growing knowledge on the part of the people of India—because their advance in English education is remarkably widespread over the country—with that growing knowledge there would be a growing discontent, and with that growing discontent a growing disloyalty, and with that growing disloyalty outrages, which I ask this meeting if they would like to face. Now, I must say that whatever commiseration and sympathy one can have with the gentlemen who have been many years in India, I think the clamour is very discreditable to their intelligence. What its origin is it is difficult to say. Some say its origin is to be found in the strong feelings of resistance prevailing among the Covenanted Civil Service. (Hear, hear.) I met with a gentleman the other day, of whom I have the highest opinion, and liberally disposed on all Indian affairs, and he rather advanced this view to me. I am not prepared to favour it, but I must say that when 450 gentlemen who have all been in the Queen's service say what that deputation said to Lord Kimberley, I am inclined to think that my friend looks with too much favour on his colleagues in the service in this respect. These gentlemen said to Lord Kimberley "that this Bill will more especially affect non-official Englishmen, and in particular the poorer members of that class." I always observe the greatest sympathy with "the poorer members" in cases of this sort. (Laughter, and Hear, hear.) Now, I will not insist upon it that the Covenanted Civil Service are at the bottom of this commotion. Some say that the non-official Englishmen in India have done much to promote it. They are like the 250 that I mentioned as forming a portion of the deputation to Lord Kimberley, and some say that after all there is a great deal of reasonableness in the statement that a great deal of trouble has arisen from the conduct and agitation of the lawyers in Calcutta. (Cheers and laughter.) There are one or two facts which go rather to support that. We know that lawyers are very ingenious everywhere, in every country—(laughter)—and we know also that they are a class of persons who in every country, and in this as well as any other, enjoy more of the fat things of the Government than any other class in the kingdom. (Laughter.) Well, I am told that recently a judge in Bengal, a native lawyer of eminence, had been appointed during the absence of his brother judge, Chief Justice of Bengal, and that this was a very unpleasant pill for the English lawyers there, some one of whom, I suppose, might have expected to take that office. They fear that this is a precedent that may be followed. Then, beyond that, I am told that a native member of the Bar has recently been appointed standing counsel to the Government of India—(cheers)—and these two appointments, and the suspicion that more may follow, have disturbed the ordinary tranquil minds of the members of the Calcutta Bar—(laughter)—and built up all this jealousy. Men in India, the 700 here, and a great many more in India, presume to tell us that to follow out the principles laid down in the Act of 1833, and in the great promises of 1858, is to disgrace Englishmen and to convulse India. (Cheers.) For my part I am not able to come to that opinion. I have known a great deal in this country of what is called setting class against class. (Hear, hear.) I know no great measure that has been advocated in this country by persons in favour even of the most judicious reforms in regard to which they have not been charged with setting class against class; and that is what is said now—that you will have a perpetual animosity between the English race in India and the great subject races, the natives of India. My opinion is that every measure of justice and generosity in the interest of India must break down the barriers of discontent and animosity, and must tend to the tranquillity and peace of the Empire. (Cheers.) But I am afraid our friends, the malcontents, have their reasons for the hostility they entertain towards Lord Ripon and his policy. I will mention two or three things which Lord Ripon has done whilst he has been in India. He has freed the native from the shackles which the preceding Government had placed upon him. (Cheers.) Now, I should think it was of the first importance that the Indian Government should know what it is that Indian writers and readers are thinking of the measures of the Government. They need not obey the intimations there received if they are satisfied that they are right. But I am quite sure that the governor of any country, whether he be the Czar of Russia, the President of the United States, the President of France, or the Great Governor of the Empire of India, must be a better, wiser, and more competent governor if he knows the prevailing opinion amongst all classes of the people regarding the measures he is intending to pass. (Hear, hear.) Then Lord Ripon has proposed a very moderate scheme of municipal government for the great cities and towns of India. Does anybody believe that municipal government, if it should be found to be good, as I believe it is in every other nation and among every other civilised and every Christian people, should be a measure of mischief amongst the populations of India? What has it done in this country? Scarcely a better measure has passed for fifty years than the Municipal Reform Bill, which established municipal corporations throughout all the great towns and cities of the United Kingdom. (A Voice, "Except London.") Yes, as a gentleman in the body of the hall says, "except London." May I make one observation apart from the question we are discussing? If the people of the various great cities and towns of the United Kingdom had been as quiescent as the people of London have been, they would not have possessed the admirable municipal governments which they have now. (Cheers.) When the four millions of the population in London, even in a gentle manner, raise their voices in favour of their being put on an equality with Liverpool, Manchester, Leeds, Birmingham, Glasgow, Edinburgh, and so forth, there is no Minister who will hesitate for a single session to confer upon them the freedom which they desire. (Cheers.) Well, now, there is one other point. Lord Ripon is very strongly in favour of primary education. (Cheers.) I know from the best sources that one of the chief difficulties—difficulties which come to many Governments and private individuals—is the want of funds. (Laughter.) Probably it would be possible—I think it would—so as to economise in many departments of the Indian Government as to afford a million or two a year for the purpose of giving primary education to 200 millions of people, when we the other night voted three millions for the education of this comparatively small population of Great Britain and Ireland. There are two other questions. One is the Bengal Rent Law, which is now before the Indian Government—a Bill which I read with care, and also a very able speech upon it the other day. The condition of Bengal with regard to land had been perhaps about as bad as the condition of Ireland three years ago—(hear, hear)—and the Bill which is proposed, in my opinion, is absolutely necessary under the circumstances; and although the zemindars, who are the landowners, are greatly opposed to it, I believe they will understand hereafter that probably the acceptance of it is the very wisest thing they can do under the circumstances in which they are placed. But Lord Ripon is understood to be also in favour of private enterprise in India; and it would be a most blessed thing for that country if it were possible for rich natives—united it may be with persons who have wealth in this country—to arrange and carry forward and maintain many great works by private enterprise. I think that would be very much better, if it were possible, than that everything should be in the hands of the Government, and the people remained unable to take part in measures which so deeply interest and concern themselves. Looking myself at the policy which Lord Ripon has pursued, so far as I have been able to understand it from the reading of the papers here and the many papers which come to me constantly from India, I am bound to say I believe it is a policy not based upon suspicion or on ancient prejudice, or on a spirit of monopoly, but on what is just and generous, and on broad views of statesmanship. (Cheers.) When the policy of conquest in India is condemned—as I have condemned it—we are told that Providence has permitted, for some great design which we are not able to measure, this wonderful thing in the history of the globe, that 250 millions of people in India should be brought subject to the control of a Parliament representing thirty-five millions of persons in Great Britain and Ireland. Well, I am not about to deny this at all. I know it has been said on high authority, speaking of the Supreme Being, that even the wrath of man shall praise him, and possibly it may be that the results which may flow from the conquest of India and its Government by this country may in some degree compensate for the crime and suffering which were committed and endured during the progress of that conquest. (Cheers.) But I should say that one thing is perfectly certain—that India was not committed to our control to be held as a field for English ambition and for English greed. (Cheers.) Our fathers may have erred—in my opinion they did greatly err—but their children may make some compensation to the countless millions now subject to their rule by a policy of generosity and justice—(cheers)—a policy which, in my opinion, India and the world at large have a right to expect and to demand from a Christian people, as we profess to be. (Cheers.) I believe that Lord Ripon desires to advance this policy, to maintain the principles laid down in the Act of 1833, a paragraph from which I read, and in the noble proclamation of the Queen issued to the people of India in the year 1858. And I may add this belief, that this meeting will sustain the Governor General of India in the arduous and conscientious performance of the duties of his high office. (Cheers.) I gather support and consolation from the answers which the Secretary of State for India made the other day to that deputation. He told them that her Majesty's Government had not the slightest idea of even suggesting to Lord Ripon to withdraw this Bill. (Cheers.) Our business here to-day is to support Lord Ripon in that policy—(renewed cheers)—and to give, by a united voice, as I hope we shall do, our utmost support to the Government existing in this country, under whom of course Lord Ripon is acting in India. He is the Governor General appointed by the Queen. He knows what there is in that proclamation of the Queen. I do not believe that Lord Ripon could (I hope there is no man that would) abandon the gracious and noble promises which the Queen in that proclamation made to the population of India. (Loud cheers.) Now I told you that Lord Kimberley had received a deputation, a formidable deputation. I shall now introduce to you a deputation—I will not say as formidable in any sense—(laughter)—except that in which a man comes forward to tell the truth with his whole heart. He comes to you—Mr. Lalmohun Ghose—appointed by his friends in Calcutta to lay before the English people some of the feelings of his countrymen on this important question.—The right hon. gentleman then sat down amid loud and long continued cheers.

Mr. LALMOHUN GHOSE said that the controversy to which the chairman had referred had been carried on in India with unparalleled bitterness for six months past, and, although he did not wish to imply that the fault was all on one side, he could safely aver that the provocation had come entirely from the other side. Lord Ripon's policy was no reckless innovation of a visionary enthusiast, but the legitimate outcome of the Act of 1833 and the Proclamation of 1858. Mr. Ilbert's Bill was a small one, but it was a step in the right direction, and was opposed only by a certain section of English officials. If they wished to create another Ireland in the East, where they would have to deal, not with 8,000,000 but with 250,000,000, then they would have only to listen to those who had already shouted themselves hoarse in India, and were now attempting to thrust their baneful counsels upon the English Government and nation. (Cheers.)

Mr. FORSTER, M.P., who on coming forward to propose the first resolution was received with loud cheers, said,—Ladies and Gentlemen—The resolution which I have been asked to propose is this—"That this meeting expresses its confidence in the administration in the Marquis of Ripon, Viceroy of India, and its belief that his policy is calculated to promote the welfare of all classes of Her Majesty's Indian subjects." After the two speeches you have heard, but very few words are wanted from me. But you will allow me, I doubt not, very briefly to state why I feel it my duty to take part in this meeting. I am prepared to admit that there ought to be good reasons for discussing questions of Indian administration upon English platforms. These questions are at once difficult and important; they involve principles upon which depends the happiness of so many millions, and yet they almost all of them require for fitting treatment so much knowledge of detail that it might well be said that if Parliamentary assemblies are fit for anything, if there is a subject which ought to be discussed by the House of Commons with fairness and moderation, and on which both sides ought to be heard, it would be such questions as we have to consider to-day. But what is our position? The opponents of Lord Ripon's policy have not shown any anxiety to have a debate on the subject in the House of Commons. They have left the matter to Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett—(laughter)—and although I am told he has a motion down for Friday evening, even he has not found it easy to frame the words of the resolution he intends to propose. (Redewed laughter.) But while there has been no anxiety to bring this question forward where both sides could be heard, there has been the most determined, energetic, and persistent effort to appeal to public opinion to condemn the policy of Lord Ripon, and those of us who approve that policy may well say that it is our duty to take care that not one side alone should be presented before the public opinion. Well, you have heard the other side to-day. I am not now alluding so much to the speech of Mr. Bright, who has that eloquence, and love, and knowledge of India which you all know, as to another speech, and I wish, if we had a debate in the House of Commons, that this representative of the people of India that we have heard—(hear, hear)—could there plead their cause. (Hear, hear.) I am not sure but that some English constituency may think it an honour and a privilege to send to the House of Commons an Indian champion of his native fellow subjects. (Hear, hear.) But, at any rate, there are members of the House of Commons here to-day, and the public, I trust will have a careful report of this meeting, and will find that there are two sides to this question. I agree with Mr. Bright that the most striking feature of this agitation is its exaggeration—(hear, hear)—the insufficiency of the measures which are denounced, even from the point of view of those who denounce them, to produce the effects attributed to them. Take this question of local self-government, and I am not sure it is not the more important measure of the two. (Hear, hear.) I am not sure that the opposition to the Ilbert Bill is not mainly on account of the opposition to the Local Self-Government Bill. It is a most interesting and informing fact that the outcry against the Ilbert Bill was so little until this measure of local self-government appeared. This measure has been decried and denounced as the abdication of English rule, as the destruction of all government in India, and yet when we come to examine it, it is solely and simply an attempt to develop those municipal institutions which successive Governors and statesmen of India have declared to be a most hopeful fact. I will give one quotation from that Governor General whom I believe to have been, perhaps, the greatest of Indian Viceroy and one of the greatest Englishmen that ever lived—Lord Lawrence. (Cheers.) Lord Lawrence's characteristic was not weakness or want of firmness. This is what he says about municipal institutions in India:—"Great public benefit is to be expected from the firm establishment of a system of municipal institutions in India. Neither the central Government nor the local Government is capable of providing either the funds or the executive agency required for making improvements in all the cities and towns of India, which are demanded by the rapidly developing wealth of the country. The people of India are quite capable of managing their own affairs. The village community, which is a little republic, is among the most abiding institutions of India. Holding the position that we do in India every view of duty and of policy should induce us to leave as much as possible of the business of the country to be done by the people." (Hear, hear.) That was a resolution passed on August 31, 1864, and was signed "Lawrence." Lord Lytton attacked Lord Ripon's policy in the House of Lords in a speech of remarkable ability, and everything that could be said against it was said by him. But there were answers given by members of the Government under whom Lord Ripon is acting—by Lord Kimberley, Lord Northbrook, and the Lord Chancellor. It appeared to be very clear before the close of that debate that this question which was first spoken of as the beginning of the destruction of the Government of India was narrowed down to a question of mere detail—a very important detail I admit, but a mere detail—namely, whether the English district officials should or should not preside over these municipalities. Lord Ripon thinks that as a rule these municipalities would be better guided and controlled from without than from within, and that advantages would be gained if the English officials were not responsible for the decision of the councils, and if the members of the councils would realise their responsibility. But Lord Ripon has said repeatedly that he applies no hard and fast rule to these municipalities; that he does not intend to treat all districts alike; that he will take into consideration the position of each district; that he will consider the differences between rural communities and towns; and that there are many cases in which it is desirable that the English district official should be a member of the council. And yet there are Anglo-Indians still saying that this measure means a revolution! Now, I need not say much about the Ilbert Bill. We might suppose, if it should pass, that what with false accusations and prejudiced and partial judges, the life and liberty of no Englishman would be safe. The Queen's proclamation has been read to you. It says nothing of colour, nothing of race, nothing of creed. The three conditions which it lays down are education, ability, and integrity. As regards the first, you all know that natives of India do often obtain an education here at great cost and with great trouble, and they have shown at examinations that they have benefited by that education. Then they have shown themselves qualified as good judges over Europeans as well as natives. In Calcutta, for example, they have tried and judged Englishmen and other Europeans, and judged them well, and now because it is proposed to extend this system to the provinces, and under certain very limited conditions to allow a very small number of native Judges to exercise in the country jurisdiction similar to that which they can already exercise in the presidencies, the advice is seriously given that Englishmen should leave India unless the Viceroy be recalled and disgraced. (Laughter.) It is instructive to look back and to see that this strong Anglo-Indian feeling, which can only be accounted for by race prejudices, was as strongly shown some years ago when the following glaring injustice was removed. It was the case that Europeans could not be tried in the same courts in which natives were tried. The Act remedying that was denounced as the Black Act, and I believe that on the first occasion when a man was punished under that Act there was a renewal of the outcry. There is a short leader in our great paper this morning—in the Times—which hints that some gentlemen who may take part in this meeting ought to answer the opinion of the Judges of the High Court of Calcutta, which is published in that newspaper. Well, the opinion is three columns long, and I think that it could hardly be expected that a layman should reply to a statement coming from so many lawyers of high position. (Laughter.) But I am inclined to believe with Mr. Ghose that some moderation is beginning to be shown in India itself, because those who express the opinion to which I have referred, though they may be opposed to the Ilbert Bill, by no means take up the same ground which was taken up a little while ago. In the document published this morning there is a very careful statement, which must and will be listened to by Lord Ripon and the Government, to the effect that there are some further conditions which ought to be imposed; and some modifications that might be made. But there is no attempt to assert, as has been asserted here and in India, that the principle of this Bill is wrong. There is no attempt to state what I have seen stated over and over again—that it is the inalienable privilege of every Englishman to be under an administration of justice differing from that set apart for the natives. (Hear, hear.) There is no attempt to assert that principle; but there is, on the contrary, an admission that the denial of that principle has not had a bad effect in some cases. Why, then, is there so much exaggeration prevalent in India? I believe the explanation to be this, that there is a reaction against that glorious proclamation by the Queen—that there is a belief, and an attempt to realise that belief, that India ought to be governed by a European governing class, or, as I should say, caste. (Hear, hear.) That belief is fraught with peril, and I will call upon those who honestly hold it to remember one or two facts. They must not forget that this governing caste will be supported by an army, of which the very large majority will be Hindoos. They must not forget that Western civilisation and English principles of government, if they mean anything, mean, firstly or lastly, the abolition of all caste—(cheers)—and they must not forget that our justification for being in India is not merely that we give to the Hindoos law and order, but that we aim at raising them in the scale of civilisation. And this is not only the justification of our rule, but to a certain extent it is a necessity attached to our rule, a necessity with which even the opponents of Lord Ripon's policy will have to deal. We cannot help by our very conduct towards the natives of India imbuing them, some would say infecting them, with Western ideas and aspirations; nor can we help, while doing that, weakening the old bonds of society in India; and therein lies the danger as well as the hope for the future of the country. England has placed India on the path of progress; but there is no denying that it is a path beset with dangers, and there is consequently a very difficult task imposed upon Lord Ripon and all Viceroys. England's government of India must be firm and strong. A weak government would be the greatest curse which we could inflict upon the inhabitants of India. But our government must be just as well as firm. We must not forget or fear our own principles, and it is because Lord Ripon does not fear those political principles, by observing which England has become a mighty nation, that I call upon you to support him against this outcry, which is equal in violence, and unfairness, and unreason to that by which Lord Canning was assailed when he strove with great success to prevent justice being replaced by revenge. (Loud cheers.) I beg to move the resolution which has been placed in my hands.

Sir G. CAMPBELL, M.P., in seconding the resolution, said he desired it to be understood that in this matter Anglo-Indian opinion was not unanimous, and that he and many others around him were on the side of what they considered to be justice and truth. There were many Anglo-Indians in favour of the measure. He would not say anything about the lawyers, but he would ask the chairman not to be too hard on the civil servants. (A laugh.) Though many of them had gone astray on this matter, it was his belief that the great majority of the Anglo-Indian civil servants had been the protectors and not the oppressors of the people of India. (Hear.) That had been the history of the Civil Service from the earliest time, and he hoped they were not likely to depart from it. He had great pleasure in seconding this resolution in favour of Lord Ripon's policy, not with respect to any particular measure, but to his general policy. He was not enthusiastic on Lord Ripon's appointment, but he had watched his policy since he went to India, and he recognised its justice and honesty, and that its principle was the greatest happiness for the greatest number. (Hear, hear.)

When the resolution was put, a gentleman in the body of the room insisted on his right to move an amendment, and for a time there was some confusion.

Mr. BRIGHT said that with the programme which had been committed to his hands he intended to proceed, but he would not object if the gentleman who wished to move the amendment would be content to do so without making a speech.

Mr. HYNDMAN, the gentleman in question, then moved the following amendment:—"That this meeting, while cordially supporting the policy of Lord Ripon in giving greater authority to duly qualified native officials, as well as in checking the greed and cruelty of the native landlords of Bengal, deeply regrets that the Government and the House of Commons should have destroyed all confidence in English justice or in the consistency of English statesmen by refusing to support the vehement protests of Lord Ripon and his Council against charging a considerable portion of the cost of our bondholders' war of conquest in Egypt upon the revenues of India."

The amendment, having been seconded, was put to the meeting and almost unanimously rejected.

The resolution was then carried unanimously, with cheers.

Mr. CHICHELE PLOWDEN, Census Commissioner for India and late extra member of the Viceroyal Legislative Council, moved the following resolution:—"That this meeting expresses its entire approval of the two measures by which Lord Ripon proposes to raise the higher class of native magistrates to a position of equality with their European colleagues, and to extend the principles of municipal government to populations whose loyalty and intelligence fit them to enjoy the privilege."

Dr. W. MARKBY, late Judge of the High Court of Calcutta, who seconded the motion, maintained that the native magistrates upon whom the Ilbert Bill would confer power were quite qualified to exercise the proposed intended jurisdiction. Those who objected to be tried by a coloured judge should remember that now an Englishman did not carry with him to India any exclusive privileges. He believed that native magistrates would not be lacking in sympathy with English defendants, and was fortified in his conviction that the Bill would not be productive of any evil result by the fact that when in the High Court at Calcutta he had never once, in a period of office extending over twelve years, known the administration of justice to be impeded or hampered in consequence of the feelings or prejudices of his native colleague. (Hear, hear.)

The CHAIRMAN, before putting the resolution, expressed his regret that owing to the lateness of the hour Mr. Cust, late Judicial Commissioner of the Punjab was prevented from speaking in support of the resolution.

The resolution was then adopted.

Sir W. LAWSON, M.P., said in the capacity of the Chairman of the Committee he wished to propose a vote of thanks to Mr. Bright. (Cheers.) He thought that great meeting, attended and presided over as it had been, must have some effect, at any rate in India, in strengthening the hands of Lord Ripon in his noble policy and in giving hope to their fellow subjects in India. When it was decided to have that meeting the Committee first of all thought what chairman they should endeavour to get, and there was but one chairman whom they wished for, and that was the right hon. gentleman who was then in the chair. (Cheers.) He felt sure that everyone present thought that they could not have got a better chairman if they searched throughout England. Mr. Bright had always wished to see justice done to India, and one great object of his life had been to show his fellow-countrymen the glory and duty of political justice throughout the world. (Loud cheers.) He believed that as time went on—in coming generations, when he hoped the great principles of liberty, equality, and fraternity would sway the family of man far more than they do at present—as time went on—nay, as long as time should last—the name of John Bright would be held in honour and in grateful recollection. (Much cheering.)

Mr. ALLAN BRYCE, in seconding the motion, remarked that as a member of a firm that was one of the largest employers of European labour in India, he wished to say that he thought the threat of the withdrawal of European capital was utterly idle, adding that similar threats were uttered fifty years ago, when it was proposed that a share in the criminal jurisdiction should be given to native judges.

The motion was then put by Sir WILFRID LAWSON and carried by acclamation.

Mr. BRIGHT, who, on rising was greeted with renewed cheers, said—I feel it very difficult to say a word in answer to your vote, or to the kind words which have been uttered by those who moved and seconded this resolution which you have just carried. I may say, however, that I am greatly obliged to the magnificent audience that we have had for listening from first to last with intense interest to the speeches of the gentlemen whom I, as chairman, have been permitted to introduce to them. I cannot but believe that the effect of this meeting will be considerable in this country, perhaps even more considerable when the report of it reaches India. I am one of those who believe that in the main India will be governed in India. At the same time, I am certain that there may be cases—and I think this is one—in which some great principle or principles are at stake, when it may be of immense advantage to call in what I will call the independent, impartial judgment of the English people to determine the question at issue. I hope we have had now laid before the country by a meeting held some time ago, and by the meeting held to-day, all that can honestly be said on both sides of this question, and I am content to leave the question to the judgment of the English people. I believe that that judgment, whether expressed by the Minister of the Crown, or by any vote taken in Parliament, or by any meeting held anywhere in this country, will be in favour of the just and wise policy which has distinguished the government of Lord Ripon in India. (Cheers.) I feel it a special honour and privilege to have been permitted to preside at this meeting. I have had for thirty years a strong interest in the welfare of that country. I have always felt that in the history of the past century—the history of our connection with India—there was much for us to regret. I have always believed, and do believe, that there is a retribution upon nations as well as upon individuals for the errors and crimes which they commit. But, more than that, I think that it is possible for a nation in one generation to do evil, perhaps unknowingly, and in a succeeding generation to make compensation by doing good. I am of this second generation. I shall leave children who will be of the generation to come, and I am anxious that whatever we have done that is evil in the past we may remedy by a tempting to do good now, and that in the future that which some may think to be a great calamity—the wars which have taken place in India, under English power—may be passed over by the historian, and he may have to tell that England having conquered the country, at any rate knew how to govern it, and that the true government of a country—the permanent government can only be based on a just and generous policy toward its people. (Great cheering.)

The meeting, which had been crowded to the last, then gradually dispersed.

THE INDIAN CRIMINAL PROCEDURE BILL.

THE following is the opinion of the Judges of the High Court of Calcutta on the Bill introduced by Mr. Herbert:—

"From Mr. C. A. Wilkins, Officiating Registrar of the High Court, to the Secretary of the Government of India, Legislative Department, High Court, English Department, Criminal. Present.—The Hon. Sir Richard Garth, Knight, Chief Justice, the Hon. H. S. Cunningham, the Hon. W. F. M'Donell, V.C., the Hon. H. T. Prinsie, the Hon. L. R. Tottenham, the Hon. A. T. Maclean, the Hon. J. F. Norris, the Hon. J. Q. Pigot, the Hon. J. O'Kinealy, the Hon. C. J. Wilkinson, the Hon. W. Macpherson, Judges of the Court.

"Calcutta, May 23, 1883.

"SIR,—In reply to your letter, No. 16C., of the 16th of March, 1883, asking for an expression of the judges' opinion on the provisions of the Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, so far as it relates to the exercise of jurisdiction over European British subjects, I am desired to say that the judges have considered the Bill, together with its annexures, and the abstract of the proceedings of the Legislative Council, so far as they relate to that measure.

"2. The judges consider it to be their duty to express without reserve the views which they entertain, not only upon the form and language of the Bill, but on its general policy and probable effects.

"3. The statement of objects and reasons set forth that, 'after consulting the Local Governments, the Government of India has arrived at the conclusion that the time has arrived for modifying the existing law and removing the present bar upon the investment of native magistrates in the interior with powers over European British subjects; and that the Government has, accordingly, decided to settle the question of jurisdiction over European British subjects in such a way as to remove from the Code, at once, and completely, every judicial disqualification which is based merely on race distinctions.'

"With this view the Bill amends section 22 of the Criminal Procedure Code, which at present restricts the appointment of justices of the peace to European British subjects, by empowering the Government to appoint any magistrate of the first class, who is either (a) a member of the Covenanted Civil Service, or (b) a member of the Native Civil Service constituted under 33 Vict., cap. 3, or (c) an assistant commissioner in non-regulation provinces, or (d) a cantonment magistrate, to be a justice of the peace.

"4. The Bill next amends section 25 of the Code, so as to provide that all sessions judges and magistrates of the district shall be justices of the peace or the territories of the Local Government under which they are serving. It then repeals so much of sections 443 and 444 of the Code, respectively, as limits jurisdiction over European British subjects to such magistrates and sessions judges as are themselves European British subjects.

"5. Accordingly, if this Bill becomes law, the effect will be that (1) all Native sessions judges and magistrates of the district will, ex officio, exercise the same jurisdiction over European British subjects as is now exercised by European officials of the same class; and (2) the Government will be empowered to invest any Native magistrate of the first class, who is either a covenanted civilian, or has been appointed under 33 Vict., cap. 3, or is an assistant commissioner in a non-regulation province, or a cantonment magistrate, with the jurisdiction over European British subjects, which by the existing law is restricted to European British subjects.

"6. Thus, a Native magistrate, who has been appointed to be a justice of the peace, will have jurisdiction (1) to inquire into any charge against a European British subject, and either commit him to the Sessions Court or High Court; or (2), if the offence be one ordinarily triable by a magistrate, to try it and impose a sentence of three months' imprisonment, or fine up to Rs. 1,000, or both. A Native sessions judge or assistant judge empowered under Section 444 will be competent to try a European British subject for any offence not punishable with death or transportation for life, and to impose a sentence of one year's imprisonment or fine of unlimited amount, or both. Cases for which, in the sessions judge's opinion, such a punishment is inadequate will be transferred to the High Court.

"7. Offences punishable with death or transportation for life will remain, in the case of European British subjects, exclusively triable by the High Court. The European British subject will retain his right, under section 451, of claiming a mixed jury or mixed assessors, his special rights of appeal under chapter 31, and his right of applying to the High Court under section 456 in case of unlawful detention.

"8. It must be remembered that in India the powers of police investigation, magisterial inquiry, and judicial trial are closely connected and are frequently combined in the same official. Under the Code of Criminal Procedure, as it now stands, any district or sub-divisional magistrate, as well as any other magistrate specially empowered in the behalf (section 191), may take cognisance of any offence, that is, intimate criminal proceedings in respect of any offence, (1), upon a complaint made, (2) upon a police report thereof, (3) upon information received from any person other than a police officer, or, (4) upon his own knowledge or suspicion that such offence has been committed.

"It is the duty of the district or sub-divisional magistrate to direct investigations by the police. He receives their daily reports and very often has to instruct them on points which he may think that they have overlooked or misapprehended. It sometimes even happens that the investigation is taken out of the hands of the police and conducted by the magistrate himself (section 159). The result of this is that the chief local magistrate practically becomes the prosecutor and may become the judge, notwithstanding that he may have formed a strong opinion on the case behind the back of the accused without having heard his explanation or defence. This is the system in force in India; and although it is probably, for administrative reason, unavoidable, it is an extremely dangerous system. It has certainly provoked adverse criticism; that it has not provoked more is probably due to the careful superintendence bestowed by district magistrates, who in Bengal hitherto been English gentlemen of the Covenanted Civil Service, whose education and training have made them fully sensible of the responsibilities which such a system as that described imposes on them in their own proceedings and also in supervising the proceedings of their subordinate sub-divisional magistrates. The present law protects European British subjects from the exercise of this dangerous combination of duties by any one but their own countrymen. The Bill under consideration proposes to remove this protection.

"10. The general result, accordingly, of the proposed amendments will be to leave European British subjects in the possession of various important rights as regards the class of officer who can commit or try them, the form of trial, the right of appeal, and the power of invoking the aid of the High Court when they are unlawfully detained in custody; but to deprive them of the right, which they at present enjoy, that in every case the inquiry or trial shall be conducted by a European British subject. It will become the duty, ex officio, of native officers of a particular class to commit or try European prisoners, even in cases in which, in person or through the police, they have initiated investigations affecting them; and the Government will be empowered to select from a wide area such other natives as it thinks well to invest with such powers.

"11. The position in which European British subjects would be placed by the proposed changes is one which they have never yet occupied, and in which the Legislature has on several occasions deliberately determined that it would not be wise to place them. On a review of the course of legislation since 1793 it is impossible, the Judges consider, to doubt that the intention and practice of the Government has been to surround the investigation and trial of offences, charged against European British subjects in the Mofussil with special precautions, and among those precautions to restrict the jurisdiction in such cases to European officials. Any doubts which the wording of particular Acts, as e.g., Act 7 of 1853, might have occasioned, have been removed by the express declarations of the Codes of 1861 and 1872, in both of which this restriction was deliberately enacted.

"12. On the other hand, as regards European officials, the result of the proposed change will be to curtail considerably the powers now exercised by Government in the appointment of justices of the peace. At present the Government can appoint such European British subjects as it thinks fit to be justices of the peace. This power has been hitherto extensively employed, and Europeans, other than covenanted civilians, have been appointed to be justices of the peace, and dispose in a manner which the Judges believe to be satisfactory, of cases in which Europeans are concerned. Under the amended section the Government will be unable to appoint any one who does not fall within one of the four classes specified in the amendment. There are at present in Bengal many such justices of the peace whose appointments would have been impossible under the amended section.

"13. The first argument adduced in favour of the proposed change in the law, which the Judges propose to consider, is that on which his Excellency the Viceroy grounded his support of the Bill in the discussion of the 9th March in the Legislative Council—viz., the expediency of taking at once a step which the policy of admitting Natives to the service rendered sooner or later inevitable. 'It is clear,' his Excellency observed, 'that though there is not at the present moment an irresistible necessity for introducing this measure, as Lord Lytton's system develops an irresistible difficulty will arise. When you have one-sixth of the Civil Service composed of natives, it will be impossible to maintain the present restriction. Therefore, what we had to consider was, is it better to wait until this necessity becomes overwhelming and irresistible, or is it better to introduce the system now? I confess it appears to me that it is far wiser, and far more in the true and substantial interests of those over whom this jurisdiction is exercised, that it should be introduced now, when the persons who would obtain these powers are very limited in number: when the circumstances under which they enter the Civil Service insure their ability and character, and when all their proceedings can be carefully watched. Being few in number, it will be easier now than afterwards for the attention of the Local Governments and the public to be directed to their proceedings, and, being the men they are, it seems to me that they would be likely to set a good example and give a good tone to those who come after them. I hold it, therefore, to be wiser to introduce the measure now, gradually, cautiously, and tentatively, than to wait till the change is forced upon us by necessity, and the powers, which are now to be given only to a few men, have to be given suddenly to a very much larger number of native civil servants. This is the ground upon which I thought that the time had come when this change could best be made.

"14. The Judges fully appreciate the necessity of adjusting the judicial machinery of the courts to the declared policy of the Secretary of State as regards the employment of natives in the judicial service. But they do not perceive that that policy necessarily involves any such change as that now suggested; nor, in any case, do they consider that the proper moment for making such a change has arrived, or that materials at present exist for deciding on the form which it ought to assume.

"The table below shows that of the civilians on the Bengal list there are at present 12 natives, either covenanted civilians, or persons admitted under 33rd Vict., c. 3. Of these two have been over eleven years in the service, one over ten, one over nine, one has been over seven years. The rest have been under five years, and of these five have served less than three years. Moreover, since 1875 only one native civilian has passed through the competitive examination, and that was in 1879. Since that year all the admissions have been under the Statute. There are, accordingly, only four officers who, in the ordinary course, would for some time to come be either magistrates of the District or Sessions Judges. As regards the rest no question is likely to arise for several years.

"15. These figures appear to the Judges to indicate that the question of the jurisdiction of native civilians over European British subjects cannot be regarded as in any way pressing for immediate solution. Though it may be intended that native officials shall ultimately constitute a sixth of the entire Civil Service, there do not appear to be grounds for expecting that this intention will be realised for many years to come. It would appear, moreover, that various causes have, of late years, led native candidates to refrain from seeking admission to the Civil Service by the competitive examination, and that the main body of native civilians will for the future be those who are appointed in this country under 33 Vict., cap. 3. Such a state of things scarcely seems to justify prospective legislation on the ground that an irresistible necessity is impending, which can be at present more conveniently and safely met than at a later date. The covenanted native civilians, who have passed into the service by the competitive examination, constitute, it is apparent, a small and dwindling class. So far as can be judged at present, the supply has come to a standstill; nor, as to admissions under 33 Vict., cap. 3, does it appear that the Local Governments have found it feasible to carry out the provisions of the Act except on a very limited scale. Three officers appear to have been appointed in Bengal in 1880, one in 1881, one in 1882. At present, therefore, the measure can, it is obvious, scarcely be regarded as having passed beyond the stage of an experiment. How these officials will turn out is a question on which it is at present, and must be for some years to come, impossible to form any confident opinion. Even as regards the earlier appointments, the Judges are of opinion that they have been too few in number, and, in the majority of instances, have lasted for too short a time, to afford material for any safe generalisation, or to justify on the ground of ascertained fitness a change in the policy of Government which would take away from European British subjects a privilege which, it is apparent, they regard as of high value and importance.

"16. If some years hence, owing to the number of native civilians having greatly increased, any administrative difficulty should arise and a change in the existing arrangements be considered necessary, such a change will, the Judges think, be more safely made at a time when there are better means than at present of judging both of the administrative difficulties which have to be met and of the capacity and character of the class of officials whose powers and responsibilities it will have the effect of enlarging. The increase in the number of native officials will not render the supervision of their behaviour in any way more difficult than it is at present. On the other hand, longer experience and a better acquaintance with the particular points as to which supervision is found to be necessary, would enable the superintending authority to perform its duties more efficiently. At any rate legislation, should it hereafter be necessary, would proceed on a basis of practical experience, not, as it is likely to do now, on mere conjecture as to the conduct and character of officers about whom scarcely anything is known.

"17. In considering the question whether legislation is at present advisable, it is necessary to keep in view the wide distinction which exists between Native officers who have entered the civil service by competitive examination in England, and those who are nominated under 33 Vict., cap. 3, in this country. The Judges are not prepared to admit that, even as regards the former class, the proposed change in the law is in any way necessary or desirable; but here there is, at any rate, some guarantee for ability, moral character, and such insight into the feelings of Englishmen as a short residence in England may be supposed to confer. On the other hand, with the statutory civilians there is absolutely no guarantee against the existence of the very defects which constitute the grounds of the reluctance of European British subjects to submit to their jurisdiction in criminal trials. They are described by the Judicial Commissioner of Oude in a document, forwarded by the Lieutenant Governor of the North-Western Provinces with his own reply to the Government of India, as 'often being men saturated with caste and religious prejudice, and ignorant of European modes of thought and feeling.' One object of the statute was, the Judges believe, to enable the Government to enrol in the ranks of its service native gentlemen of high birth and social position. It is easy to imagine cases in which a gentleman might have on these grounds great claims to a nomination under the statute, who might yet be conspicuously deficient in many of the qualifications which are admittedly essential in the Judge who is to deal with cases in which European British subjects are concerned. It must be remembered that it is with officials of this class, not with successful competitors in the Civil Service examination, that, in considering the present question, we have principally to deal; nor can the Judges lose sight of the fact that these statutory civilians will be appointed by a system of nomination which was abandoned by the Government 25 years ago in favour of competitive examination, and which can scarcely be expected to work more satisfactorily in India than it did in England. On the officers thus nominated the proposed change will confer a jurisdiction unknown to English law, a combination of inquisitorial, magisterial, and judicial powers, which may be justified by the necessities of the case of India, but which Englishmen in India may with some reason contend should continue to be exercised in their own case, as it is at present, only by officials for whose competence or character they have some adequate guarantee.

"18. The apprehensions which many Europeans entertain as to the results of the proposed change are not, in the Judges' opinion, without N.B.—The last four officers have not yet passed their examinations completely, and as officers are not considered eligible for promotion until they pass fully, it is difficult to determine the probable time when they will rise to the rank of Officiating Magistrates or Officiating Judges. It takes an officer seven years or thereabouts from date of passing to rise to the position of an Officiating Magistrate, and about nine years to get an Officiating Judgeship.

foundation. There is no doubt that the position of Europeans in the Mofussil has many disadvantages. They are often completely isolated, they live among people alien to themselves in religion, nationality, social habits, and political ideas. As owners of property and employers of labour, they are necessarily brought into collision with classes or individuals whose interests conflict with their own; and it is impossible to ignore the fact that such a state of things exposes them to very considerable risks. The attention of the Government was forcibly drawn to this fact by the Hon. Sir Steuart Bayley in the debate of March 9. 'There is,' he said, 'another aspect to the case of the opposition which I think deserves most attentive consideration, and this is the real danger which the isolated European, living in the Mofussil, runs from false cases trumped up against him. It is right that I should state publicly that this danger is a very real and very serious one, for probably no member of this Council has had the same experience as I have of the lives led by planters in the mofussil. My own experience has given me a strong feeling on this matter, and anyone who knows the extreme bitterness with which disputes about land are fought out in the mofussil, and the unscrupulous methods to which recourse is had in conducting these disputes before the Court—methods to which a planter cannot have recourse—will understand how precarious his position may become, and how essential to him it is that the law should be well and wisely administered.'

"19. The Judges concur in the views here expressed; and they consider that the dangers thus described in the case of planters and manufacturers would be even greater in the case of persons in a humbler position in life, railway employes, artificers, and the like. These men are continually brought into contact with natives in ways which may easily give rise to misunderstandings and ill-will. Should an accusation be brought against them, they labour under great disadvantages; they are often isolated from other Europeans; they generally have but an imperfect acquaintance with the vernacular languages; they are unable to retain the costly services of European advocates; and they might, in some circumstances, find it impossible to secure the assistance even of native practitioners. It is easy to see how the grossest injustice might easily be inflicted in such cases by an officer who from any cause failed fully to realise the position of the accused. It is at any rate certain that Europeans of this class would feel an entire want of confidence in any but a European tribunal. On the whole, after making every allowance for temporary excitement and agitation, it is, the Judges think, impossible to doubt that European residents in the mofussil do really consider themselves to be, and in fact are, in a position which justifies them in regarding the privilege of being tried by a European, on whose independence and impartiality they can fully rely, as one of very real importance to them.

"20. Accordingly, as the number of native officials who will be affected by the proposed change is extremely small; as it seems probable that the majority of native officials will for the future be statutory nominees, appointed in this country without any guarantee as to ability, and not necessarily possessing any acquaintance with the habits or feelings of Englishmen; as there is no evidence of any real demand for any such alteration; as the proposed change will disqualify a class of European officers who at present perform their duties to the entire satisfaction of the Government and the public; and as it cannot, it appears, be affected without a revival of animosities and class feelings, which are, on every account, to be deplored, the Judges consider that nothing short of grave and pressing reasons could justify its introduction.

"21. But, so far as their own observations go, the Judges are unaware of the existence of any of the reasons on which a legislative change is usually demanded. In the exercise of their duties of superintendence and revision, they have occasion to watch attentively the working of the criminal courts, the returns of which are continually before them. Nothing in those returns indicates that there is at present any administrative inconvenience, any miscarriage of justice, any hardship inflicted on prosecutors, witnesses, or accused, or any dissatisfaction felt with the provisions of the Code as to the jurisdiction of the Courts. Some provisions of the Code are, the Judges are aware, believed by some persons to operate severely, and any measure for the reform of these would deserve consideration. It might be well, for instance, to consider the possibility of extending to natives in the Mofussil, under certain conditions, the right of the nature of a habeas corpus, now exclusively enjoyed by Europeans, of applying to the High Court in cases of unlawful detention. But as regards the powers conferred on the several classes of Courts and the rights enjoyed by European British subjects in criminal cases, the Judges are not aware that there is any feeling of grievance or, except among a few individuals, any wish for change. On the contrary, the Judges believe that the privileges now enjoyed by Europeans are readily acquiesced in by the main body of natives, who understand and sympathise with the natural desire of Europeans to be tried by their own countrymen, and who appreciate the evils to which any alteration of the existing law may probably conduce.

"22. They are confirmed in this view by the fact that, though the Criminal Procedure Code was for several years under consideration, and was criticised minutely by every Local Government, and though a very large body of official opinion was collected from every rank in the service, no suggestion on the subject was made by any responsible authority till Sir A. Eden's communication of the 20th March, 1882, enclosing Mr. Gupta's letter of 30th January, 1882.

"23. The Judges find that their views as to this part of the subject are endorsed by his Honour the Lieutenant Governor, who, in his speech on the 9th March, observed that 'there were a great many facts which supported the contention that there is no administrative difficulty in connection with the matter,' and expressed his conviction that 'this measure is unnecessary in the present condition and constitution of the native judicial covenanted service in Bengal.'

"24. On these grounds the Judges are of opinion that there is nothing in the present condition or prospects of the service which renders a change of the law expedient; nor do they think that any necessity is likely to arise within any period sufficiently near to require or justify legislation, especially when that legislation arouses apprehensions and animosities which are on every ground matter of regret.

"25. In connection with this part of the subject, it may be well to point out that the rapid development of railway and telegraphic communication, which has been urged by some of the supporters of the Bill as a reason for considering it to be free from danger, goes far, and will year by year go farther, to meet the argument based on administrative necessity. There are few parts of India, and there will soon it is to be hoped be none, in which a European cannot be forwarded to any place in which it may be desired to try him, with ease, speed, and economy. Europeans in India are, for the most part at the present day, for all practical purposes, far nearer to the tribunals to which they are subject than they have ever been before; and their transmission from one place to another will year by year become a matter of less difficulty.

"26. The foregoing considerations, in the Judges' opinion, sufficiently dispose of the question of the expediency of introducing the measure at the present time. But some of the grounds on which the defence of the proposed change in the law was rested by the supporters of the Bill, seem to the Judges to call for observation. In the first place, as to the reasons adduced for the change. 'The only object we have in view,' it was observed by the honourable member who moved the introduction of the Bill, 'is to provide for the impartial and effectual administration of justice. It is by this test that we desire our proposals to be tried.' Tried by that test the proposal seems to the Judges indefensible, for no one has suggested that the present administration of justice is not effectual and impartial, or that it will become in any degree more impartial or more effectual by the proposed alteration. On the contrary, the proposal is that a class of cases, which are admitted to be of so 'exceptionally troublesome and difficult a character' as to justify their exclusion from the cognisance of any but specially qualified tribunals, shall be no longer confined to a class of officials who in their disposal at present give entire satisfaction and command entire confidence, but shall become cognisable by officials who, speaking generally, offer a less complete guarantee for impartiality and independence—who necessarily labour under the disadvantages arising from difference of nationality and social habits, and in whom the portion of the community concerned confessedly places less confidence than in the existing tribunals. If, as the honourable member says, the trial of Europeans is 'apt to put an exceptionally severe strain on the judicial qualities of tact, judgment, patience and impartiality,' it is difficult to understand how the interests of justice can be promoted by committing these cases to officials who are regarded, and, the Judges consider, rightly regarded, as less qualified to deal with them than those who at present are empowered to do so. Under the proposed law any Native Assistant-Commissioner who has served long enough to become a first-class magistrate, might, in Assam or in any other non-regulation province, be empowered to commit or try Europeans. Europeans may not unreasonably regard such an arrangement as providing less satisfactory than the existing law for the impartial and effectual administration of justice in their own case. It is no disparagement of the integrity or ability of a native judge to say that he is necessarily more amenable to the external influences to which popular feeling, local prejudice, or the wishes and interests of powerful individuals may give rise, than in a European officer, to whom such matters are for the most part unknown. It would be easy to conceive cases in which it would require no ordinary fortitude and independence on the part of a native official to run counter to the prevailing sentiments of the society in which he lives. It not unfrequently happens that our superior officials are asked to transfer an important case from some native judge or magistrate, not because from deficiency of experience or judicial knowledge he is unable to try it, but because one side or other apprehends (and sometimes even both sides unite in this respect) that some unknown or improper influence will be brought to bear on that officer.

"27. In this respect it is necessary to point out that the present measure differs fundamentally from those by which in years past Europeans have been brought gradually within the jurisdiction of the civil and criminal courts. On each of these occasions the reform had this strong justification, that it was really demanded in the interest of an impartial and effectual administration of the law. Justice could not, it is obvious, be done between Europeans and others either in civil or criminal cases, so long as a European could be brought before no tribunal nearer than the presidency town. Such a state of the law was in many cases tantamount to a denial of justice, and in criminal matters it practically, in all but very serious cases, secured impunity to the favoured class. On these grounds the changes heretofore made were justifiable and wise. But on the present occasion it cannot be suggested that the change will make the trial or punishment of European criminals in any one respect easier, speedier, cheaper, or more certain.

"28. One of the grounds most frequently alleged in support of the Bill was that the present state of the law was anomalous, and that this anomaly justified legislation. As to this, it is, the Judges think, enough to point out that the entire structure of Indian society and the British administration rests on personal laws, under which particular classes or individuals enjoy special rights apart from the general law applicable to the entire community. These rights have been solemnly guaranteed to the inhabitants of the country and are conscientiously respected by the Legislature and the Courts. The principle laid down in the preamble of 21 Geo. III., c. 70, that it was 'expedient that the inhabitants should be maintained and protected in the enjoyment of all their ancient laws, usages, rights, and privileges,' has been consistently maintained; and the Act which at present regulates the Civil Courts in Bengal (Act 6 of 1871) expressly provides that, in all questions regarding succession, inheritance, marriage, or caste, or religious usage or institution, the personal law of Hindoos and Mahomedans shall be the rule of decision. These personal rights are observed, so far as the Judges are aware, with equal care and with ready acquiescence by the people in their dealings with one another. They are insisted on by the class concerned whenever they appear to be endangered. Only a year ago the entire Hindoo and Mahomedan communities were exempted from some of the most important provisions of the 'Transfer of Property Act' out of respect to the wishes of certain native gentlemen who were apprehensive that the proposed enactment might be regarded as discountenancing their view of the Hindoo law. Such being the universal rule, the English in India may, the Judges think, with some reason demand that a like regard may be paid to their personal rights, for which they have at any rate the prescription of long usage, which they highly prize, and which are not shown to conflict in any way with the rights of any class. The question asked in the course of discussion on the Code of 1872, when the law was placed on its present footing, seems to the Judges extremely pertinent—are English people to be told that, while it is their duty to respect all these laws scrupulously, they are to claim nothing for themselves? That, while the English Courts are to respect and even to enforce a variety of laws, which are thoroughly repugnant to all the strongest convictions of Englishmen, Englishmen who settle in this country are to surrender privileges to which, rightly or otherwise, they attach the highest possible importance?

"29. Another ground urged in support of the proposed change in the law is the invidious character of the existing distinction. If by 'invidious' is meant that the law, as it stands, unfairly benefits Europeans to the detriment of natives, or that the privilege now enjoyed by Europeans can justly be regarded as offensive to native feeling, the Judges are unable to see any foundation for such a charge. It is not suggested that the rights now enjoyed by Europeans should be extended to the entire community, or that the proposed change would improve in any particular the general administration of the law. If by the abolition of the present rights of Europeans the natives would be benefited, the balance of advantages might have to be struck; but this is not the case. No practical advantage for natives is to be gained.

"30. If even, apart from considerations of practical benefit, there were reasons to think that the present state of the law was, or could reasonably be, regarded by natives as humiliating or insulting to them or their countrymen, the Judges would consider that the possibility of remedying such a state of things deserved serious attention. But they cannot believe that such is the case. There is nothing in the existing law which implies any personal disparagement to any one. There may be in the ranks of the native service officials who resent the existing law because it impliedly recognises the existence of a difference between Europeans and natives, and because they regard such a recognition as obsolete, injurious, and oppressive. The Judges cannot regard such feelings as deserving of sympathy or consideration. Those differences, as a fact, exist, and any attempt to ignore them would, the Judges believe, be unwise and disastrous. So far as the present measure encourages the belief in any class of the community that such differences have ceased to exist—that Hindoos and Englishmen can live side by side, not only with just and equal laws, but with absolute identity of status in every particular—it must, the Judges consider, be regarded as a probable source of future difficulty. No reasonable official need feel aggrieved or humiliated because the law lays down a general rule that a class of especially difficult cases shall be tried by the officials who are confessedly most competent to try them, to whom their trial has hitherto been invariably confined, and to whom the class concerned earnestly desires that they should continue to be restricted. As was observed in the debate in 1872, 'The privilege as to the jurisdiction is the privilege of the prisoner, not the privilege of the judge. The European has an objection to be tried by a native. Considering the position in which he stands, the question is whether you will put him in a position in which he does not at present stand. You place no slight upon a native by saying that he can only try a man of his own race. What is there against the feelings of the native in that? Why should any one feel a slight because he is told that a particular man is to be tried in a particular way. On the other hand, it is a feeling, and not an unnatural one, that a man should wish to be tried by his own countrymen.' This feeling, as a fact, is recognised by the provisions of the code which allow Europeans and natives alike to claim that at least half of the jury by which they are to be tried shall consist of persons of their own race.

"31. Much reliance has been placed on the argument that for many years past native magistrates have in the Presidency towns exercised jurisdiction over European British subjects without giving rise to complaint. As to this, it is, the Judges think, enough to say that the position of the Presidency magistrates, from the close proximity of the High Courts, the facilities thus afforded for supervision and control, the presence of a large and influential Bar, the activity of the local Press, and the influence of public opinion, renders it safe to intrust these officials with far more extensive powers than could be safely conceded in the case of Mofussil magistrates. This view has been adopted by the Legislature, which empowers (C. P. C., 411) a Presidency magistrate to pass a sentence of imprisonment for six months or fine of Rs.200 without any appeal, whereas in the Mofussil, first class magistrates and sessions judges are unable to pass a higher sentence than one month or Rs.50 fine without appeal; and in the case of European British subjects no order passed by either is unappealable. For these reasons the Judges cannot consider the experience of the Presidency Magistrates' Courts as in any degree justifying the investment of native officers in the Mofussil with jurisdiction over Europeans.

"32. Lastly, the Judges have to consider the question of the finality of the Bill. They are, of course, perfectly satisfied that any assurances which may be given by the present Government or any members of it in that respect will be fully and faithfully adhered to. But such assurances would not be binding upon any future Government, and still less upon the native community. There would seem to be no elements of finality either in the Bill itself, or in its subject matter. There is no reason why those in deference to whose wishes the Bill has been introduced should accept it otherwise than as a prelude to still larger concessions; and it may probably be more difficult in the future for Europeans to protect their rights when the principle upon which those rights depend has once been invaded.

"33. The Judges have endeavoured in the preceding remarks to explain why they consider the grounds for the introduction of the Bill to be insufficient. They believe that they have shown that it is justified by no necessity, either immediately present or sufficiently near at hand to require consideration; that the native civilians who enter the service by competition are a small and dwindling class; that nothing is as yet, or can be for many years, known of the officers appointed under 33 Vict.

c. 3, except that they have not had the residence in England which is supposed by some to render the covenanted civilians competent to exercise the proposed jurisdiction; that the circumstances of Mofussil life render the present privileges of Europeans in the Criminal Courts not a mere sentimental gratification, but an important safeguard against a real danger; that the measure cannot be defended as contributing to the more effectual and impartial administration of justice—an object which the present law sufficiently attains, and which it is not pretended that the amended law would attain any better; that in this respect the present Bill differs from former measures of a like nature, which had for their object the removal of an acknowledged grievance; that the anomaly involved in the present state of the law is merely one instance of a state of things on which the entire structure of Indian society depends; that the right which the proposed legislation will take away ought not to be, and in fact is not generally, regarded as invidious or oppressive; and finally, that the Bill does not possess the elements of finality claimed for it, but on the contrary must, whatever be the wishes of the Government, be hereafter made the standing ground from which further innovations will be demanded. On these grounds the Judges feel bound to express their strong disapproval of the Bill.

"34. I am directed to state that the Hon. Mr. Justice Mitter will record his opinions on the subject of the Bill in a separate minute.—I have the honour to be, Sir, your most obedient servant,

"C. A. WILKINS, Officiating Registrar."

HOME NEWS.

MOVEMENTS OF TROOPS.—The arrangements for the reliefs of the season 1883-84 are now in substance completed. Owing to the prevalence of cholera in Egypt, the troops going to India will, in the first instance at least, be sent round by the Cape, and as a consequence, the first batch of troopships will go out some three or four weeks earlier than usual. Four will sail between the 4th and 16th of September. With regard to the cavalry, it was at first arranged that the Inniskilling Dragoons in Natal were to take the place of the 10th Hussars on the Indian establishment. It is, however, not considered advisable to withdraw the regiment from South Africa, and they will remain there for the present. The 7th Dragoon Guards, who have been quartered at Shorncliffe since their arrival home from Egypt in March, will proceed to India, being quartered at Mhow, in the room of the 17th Lancers, who go to Lucknow in the place of the 10th Hussars. The last-named regiment, on arrival home, will probably be stationed at Shorncliffe. The four infantry battalions to take their place regularly on foreign service are the 1st North Lancashire, the 2nd York and Lancaster, the 1st Royal Irish Fusiliers, and the 2nd Royal Munster Fusiliers, the first and last-named of which are already in the Mediterranean, temporarily replacing two battalions in Egypt. Three of them will proceed to India, and will be quartered at Rawul Pindie, Ahmednuggur, and Kamptee respectively. The three battalions to return from India are the 1st York and Lancaster from Aden, the 2nd North Lancashire from Allahabad, and the 2nd Royal Irish Fusiliers from Belgaum. After these changes the next cavalry regiment in India for home will be the 13th Hussars, and the three next infantry battalions the 1st Essex, 2nd East Surrey, and the 1st Royal Irish; while those to go out would be the 1st East Surrey, 2nd Royal Irish, and probably the 2nd Highland Light Infantry. These battalions, together with the 2nd Royal Sussex at Malta, the 2nd Durham at Gibraltar, the 2nd Oxford, and the 2nd South Lancashire, have been placed on the highest strength of 950 rank and file each; the four standing next—viz., the 2nd South Yorkshire, 2nd Dublin Fusiliers, 1st Hampshire, and 1st Dorset—at 850 each; the four next—1st North Stafford, 1st Royal London Fusiliers, 1st East Kent, and 1st Cheshire—at 750; and the 3rd Battalion Rifle Brigade, 1st Norfolk, 2nd East Yorkshire, and the 1st Duke of Cornwall's at 650 each. The 2nd Essex, at Gibraltar, is not likely to be brought home, but the 2nd Durham and 2nd Sussex will come from the Mediterranean as soon as two battalions from Egypt become available for their relief, while the Cameron Highlanders will return home from Egypt when political events permit their withdrawal.

INDIAN GOLD MINES.—The fifth ordinary general meeting of the shareholders of this company was held on Wednesday at Glasgow; Mr. John Wilson, of Hillhead House, in the chair. The secretary submitted the annual report, in which the directors expressed regret at being unable to give the result of regular crushing of the company's mines, though the most recent advices indicated that crushing had begun with ten head of stamps at the large mill. An outbreak of fever prevented the starting of the mill in January last, and in April the manager, Mr. Severn died. Mr. Oakley, the assistant engineer, was placed in charge of the works, and under him operations had since been conducted. The foundations of a second head of stamps had been laid, and the director expected that by this time the new stamp mill had been completed. Reference was also made in the report to the fact that one of the directors of the company, Mr. M'Alpine, who had gone out to India to inspect the company's property, had been attacked by fever, and had been obliged to come home. He had given the directors a report of the state of the mines, and from a consideration of it the directors were of the opinion that it would be wise to stop operations at the present juncture. They proposed to direct special attention to the opening out of the Skull and Hamlin Reefs, regarding the latter of which Mr. M'Alpine, stated that it would certainly pay the cost of working. As the funds on hand at the present date only amounted to about £2,500 it would be necessary, if it was decided to continue operations, to make a further call on the new share and it was proposed that the sum to be called in the meantime should be £1 5s. per share. The chairman, in moving the adoption of the report, stated that the latest letter from Mr. Oakley, the manager at the mines, was dated June 29, and was received here on Monday last. It stated that great damage had been caused at the mines by the bursting of a monsoon with very heavy rains. This had thrown the operations further back, and the crushing at the date had not yet been commenced. The chairman continuing, referred to the visit of Mr. M'Alpine to the company's mines; that gentleman had so far regained his health that he was willing to go back to India should the meeting resolve to give the mines another year's trial. Mr. M'Alpine was satisfied that the Skull and Hamlin Reefs could be profitably worked, the latter, so far as he had been able to prove it, had yielded an ounce of gold to a ton of quartz. If the whole reef turned out like that, then the affairs of the company were not in such a hopeless state after all, but he was bound to admit that so far for the past four years they had been endeavouring simply to get the machinery started, and it had not been started yet. The call on the shares would yield £6,250, and that would keep the company going some time longer. The report was unanimously adopted, this being taken as a wish of the shareholders that the business of the company should be persevered with. The retiring directors were afterwards re-elected.

COUNCIL DRAFTS ON INDIA.—On Wednesday, August 1 tenders for Rs. 25,00,000 in bills and telegraphic transfers on India were received at the Bank of England. The amounts allotted were:—In bills on Calcutta, Rs. 30,000, at an average rate of 1s. 7<sup>3</sup>/<sub>4</sub> d. In telegraphic transfers—on Calcutta, Rs. 16,00,000, at an average rate of 1s. 7<sup>3</sup>/<sub>4</sub> d.; and Bombay, Rs. 15,00,000, at an average rate of 1s. 7<sup>3</sup>/<sub>4</sub> d.; or a total allotment of Rs. 31,30,000. Tenders for bills at 1s. 7<sup>3</sup>/<sub>4</sub> d., and for telegraphic transfers on Calcutta and Bombay at 1s. 7<sup>3</sup>/<sub>4</sub> d. and above, received in full. Up to July 31 the amount of remittances sold since the beginning of the financial year was Rs. 6,65,91,350, realising £5,386,735. Applications for the same amount will be received on Wednesday.

THE SILVER MARKET AND THE EASTERN EXCHANGES.—Messrs. Sharps and Wilkins' fortnightly circular states:—"Some days after the date of our last circular the silver market became very dull, and the price dropped away to 50 5-16d., but recovered again to 50 7-16d. on a better allotment of council transfers last Wednesday, and the market has since continued steady. The price has been governed almost entirely by Indian rates, as the Continental inquiry has been very limited. Mexican dollars have not varied at all; the demand for China and the Straits has not been sufficient to absorb the whole of the arrivals, and a portion of those to hand per Nile have been sold for their value as metal."—On Friday the silver market and all Eastern exchange rates were unaltered. Business in the uncoined and coined metal was very limited. Rupee Paper was in slightly better demand, and prices harder. The Four-and-a-Half per Cents. closed at 83<sup>3</sup>/<sub>4</sub> to 83<sup>3</sup>/<sub>4</sub>, and the Four per Cents. at 79<sup>3</sup>/<sub>4</sub> to 80.

INDIAN RAILWAYS.—The Secretary of State for India in Council has given notice of his intention to purchase the Eastern Bengal Railway, in pursuance of the power contained in the contract of the 30th of July, 1858. The railway will consequently (subject to such arrangements as may hereafter be agreed upon) come under the authority of the Secretary of State on the 30th of June, 1884.

LONDON PRODUCE MARKETS.—Messrs. W. and J. H. Thompson state that there is nothing of interest to report. The low prices of imported produce at present fail to promote speculative feeling. Rather more inquiry prevails for coffee, and yesterday Guatemala in many cases sold at 1s. to 1s. 6d. per cwt. recovery upon last week's rates. Costa Rica is rather firmer, and further business has been done at Brazil on floating terms at current low prices. Fine qualities of Plantation Ceylon, including bold, have gone rather above valuations. The stock of coffee in London has, however, further increased to 31,600 tons, against an average stock of 22,300 tons in the four previous years at same date. 101,000 bags Java and 400 cases Padang will be offered at public sale by the Netherlands Trading Company on Wednesday, the 8th instant. Cocoa has been unsettled. The raw sugar market is steady, although without animation. Beet, of the new crop, offers at easier rates. It is too early to form any opinion as to the season's out-turn. Many expect that it will not exceed that of 1882-3. Further operations in white pepper have transpired, latterly at an advance of <sup>1</sup>/<sub>4</sub> d. per lb. Black shows an upward tendency. There have been heavy arrivals of new season's tea, and, with some pressure to realise, the prices at auction are generally easier for the commoner grades of Congou. The Indian tea market is rather quiet, and the public sales have gone slowly. Rough Cochin and Bengal ginger obtain higher rates. Zanzibar cloves continue very dull, and prices nominal, Cinchona bark has sold with irregularity, being occasionally lower. Rice is the same as last quoted. The markets are closed for the holidays.

THE ARMY MEDICAL SCHOOL AT NETLEY.—The summer session of the Army Medical School was brought to a close yesterday, when the prizes were distributed to the successful students in the lecture-room at the Royal Victoria Hospital, Netley. The following is the list of surgeons on probation who have gained commissions in Her Majesty's Indian Medical service, in order of merit, and with the total number of marks gained by them at both the London and Netley, examinations:—Combined marks.—1. J. M. Young, 5,680 (gained the Herbert Prize, the Martin Memorial Gold Medal, the Montefiore Medal, and the Parkes Memorial Bronze Medal); 2. G. Jameson, 5,257; 3. M. A. T. Collie, 5,225; 4. W. H. Quicke, 4,733; 5. A. O. Evans, 4,691.

INDIA IN PARLIAMENT.

THE "SPOILATION OF INDIA."

In reply to Mr. P. Edwards, Mr. Cross said: My attention has been called to the very extraordinary article in the Nineteenth Century entitled "The Spoliation of India." I think it would be well that parts of the very voluminous returns of Indian salaries and pensions presented in 1881 should be printed for the information of the House. If the nominal lists are omitted, I believe it would not cover more than 16 or 20 pages of print. With respect to the pensions, I may say that in a speech in this House on the 8th of May last I said that they were about £4,000,000 sterling in England and about 119 lakhs of rupees in India, the total cost to India to provide this payment being some 60,000,000 rupees. This includes the pensions of natives. I may say that it is quite impossible within the limits of an answer to a question to state the arrangements which have been made with the native States respecting salt and other duties; but I will lay upon the table of the House the letter of the Government of India of September 26, 1878, reporting for approval the nature and consequences of those arrangements, by which it is shown the native States receive an amount equal to the whole of the increased tax on the salt consumption of their populations. The India Office does not possess the correspondence asked for, which, with few exceptions, is in the vernacular.

CHOLERA IN INDIA.

Mr. O'DONNELL asked the Under Secretary for India whether it was true that during the week ending May 30 there were 636 cases of cholera and 278 deaths from cholera in the Poonah district, and 395 cases and 220 deaths in the Thana district, and whether this proportion of deaths proved the virulence of the epidemic; and whether, in reference to some districts, as in Ahmednagar, the official reports failed to give any statistics, but confined themselves to the statement that there was "cholera throughout the district."

Mr. CROSS: The figures quoted for the Thana and Poonah districts are correct. In reply to the last part of the question, I may explain that when the mortality from cholera is small, the numbers are not necessarily given in the weekly season returns from the separate districts, but when mortality becomes excessive, they are published weekly. The statistics for Ahmednagar have been published weekly since June 5. Complete cholera statistics are given in the sanitary returns made up at the close of the year. Up to the end of last month cholera was very prevalent in the Deccan districts of Bombay, though the rest of the presidency was unusually free from the disease. The present epidemic, however, does not appear to be of exceptional virulence. In 1881, with 16,700 deaths, the ratio to mortality to attacks was over 47 per cent., while in the present epidemic the ratio is 43 per cent. The average deaths from cholera in the Bombay presidency for the fifteen years ending 1880 have been 20,172 per annum, most of which occurred between May and September.

Mr. O'DONNELL gave notice that he would ask a further question on the subject.

THE DISTRICT JUDGE OF CUDDAPAH, MADRAS.

Mr. O'DONNELL asked the Under Secretary for India whether Mr. Wallace, District Judge of Cuddapah, Madras, had been suspended for charging the senior member of Council with taking presents from natives; whether, Mr. Wallace having declined to withdraw his charges, his case had been referred for orders to the Secretary of State; and whether he would be allowed an impartial inquiry, to be conducted by persons not under the orders of the Madras Government.

Mr. CROSS: It is not the case that Mr. Wallace has been suspended for charging the senior or any other member of Council with taking presents from Natives. On Friday, I informed the hon. member that the matter was under the consideration of the Government of India, who have not yet reported it for the Secretary of State's orders. This case will be dealt with in the same manner as that of any other member of the Covenanted Civil Service in a similar position.

OUTRAGES ON ENGLISH LADIES IN INDIA.

Mr. STANHOPE asked the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Government had received any confirmation of the reports of horrible outrages upon English ladies in Calcutta and Howrah.

Mr. CROSS: No, Sir, the Government of India have not given us any information on the subject. If the hon. gentleman will give me any authentic statement on which I can make an inquiry, I will take care that the inquiry shall be made.

BURMESE EMBASSY TO PARIS.

Mr. ONSLOW asked the Under Secretary for India whether it was true that a mission said to be sent by the King of Burma had arrived in Paris, and whether, if so, he could state to the House the object of the mission.

Mr. CROSS: No information has been received at the India Office as to the arrival of the Burmese Embassy at Paris. The object of the mission is stated by the Burmese authorities to be purely scientific and industrial.

INDIAN COOLIES IN REUNION.

Mr. PEASE asked the Under Secretary of State for India whether Her Majesty's Government possessed any means for rescuing the Indian coolies now in Réunion from the oppression and ill-treatment to which they were subjected; and whether any British Consul was now on that island.

Mr. CROSS:—The convention of June 1, 1861, with the French Government, under which emigration from India to Réunion was conducted, is still in force as regards Indian coolies in that colony who have not renounced their right to a return passage to India. And the English Government has the same means now which it has always had of interfering for the protection of the coolies if ill-treated. There is at the present time an acting Consul at Reunion.

THE INDIAN MEDICAL SERVICE.

Mr. O'SHEA asked the Under Secretary of State for India whether the only official information furnished to candidates for the Indian Medical Service regarding their pay and allowances, when in India, was contained in a memorandum supplied by the India Office; whether paragraph 18 of that memorandum stated that the pay of a surgeon in charge of a regiment, who had passed the "lower standard" language test, was, if under five years' service, 450 rupees, and, if over five years' service, 600 rupees a month; whether it was a fact that, although with five exceptions the surgeons in Bengal were qualified, not one of them, having less than five years' service, was now in receipt of the rate of pay laid down in the above-mentioned paragraph 18; whether on the 1st of January last only four of the eighty-four surgeons appointed to Bengal within the previous six years were in receipt of the rates therein specified; and whether any mention of "officiating pay," which was substituted for the rates promised under the conditions of paragraph 18, occurred in the official memorandum inviting candidates to compete.

Mr. CROSS: I think my honourable and gallant friend assumes that paragraph 18 of the India Office memorandum guarantees to all surgeons of five years' service who have passed the language test, the substantive charge of a regiment, which alone commands the pay of 600 rupees per month. The first and governing qualification for the receipt of 600 rupees a month is that the "five years' service language test man" shall be in substantive command of a regiment. Till then, he is only strictly entitled to unemployed pay. The Bengal Army List shows that on the 1st of January, 1883, of the eighty-four surgeons appointed during the six previous years, twenty-one were holding substantive or acting civil appointments at varying rates of staff pay, and eight had not passed the language test. Of the remaining fifty-five only four were in substantive charge of regiments, and therefore entitled to the full rate of salary prescribed in paragraph 18, but twenty-four were officiating for the actual holders of the appointments, and were drawing acting allowance which, though less than the full rate of salary, is more than the unemployed pay. The twenty-seven remaining officers held no charge, either substantive or acting, and were drawing only unemployed pay as notified in the memorandum. This memorandum is the only official information furnished to candidates for the Indian Medical Service. It mentioned only the salaries of the substantive appointments tenable by medical officers, and does not refer to the rates of officiating pay, which are not substituted for the rates laid down in the memorandum, but are supplementary to them, being payments to officers who do not come under the conditions of the memorandum. I have several times explained the causes of there being a temporary excess of medical officers who do not hold the substantive appointments which command the higher rates of pay.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY, JULY 31.

THE BRITISH COMMISSION AT SIMLA.

In reply to Sir W. Lawson,

Mr. CROSS said some of the recommendations of the British Commission which sat at Simla upwards of two years ago to consider the military expenditure of India had been carried out. The recommendations would lead to a reduction of expenditure, but he intended to make a fuller statement on the subject in introducing the Indian Budget.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY, AUGUST 2.

ADEN.

Mr. BARCLAY asked the Under Secretary of State for India whether the whole cost of the military establishment at Aden was charged to the Indian Treasury; what was the total cost of the establishment, including the pay of the troops; and what amount (approximately) had been expended since 1858 on the fortifications of Aden and their equipment.

Mr. J. K. CROSS: I may say that Aden is administered as part of the Presidency of Bombay. The whole cost of the military establishment there is charged to Indian revenues. The Finance and Revenue Accounts do not enable me to answer the question of my hon. friend as to the cost of the establishment and of the fortifications. But it appears from a return, furnished by the Government of India in 1875, that for the average of three years ending 1873-4 the annual net cost of Aden to India (including public works and marine) was over 21 lakhs of rupees. The cost of the military establishment was 16 lakhs; of civil administration, 1½ lakh; of public works (including military works), 2½ lakh; of marine, 1¼ lakh. The India Office has no detailed information of the total expenditure on these fortifications.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY, AUGUST 3.

INDIAN EXPENDITURE.

Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the Under-Secretary of State for India whether in his statement that "the Viceroy, Lord Ripon, had reduced the expenditure in 1881-82 by £6,300,000" he included the sum of £9,700,000, being the reduction under the head of Military Reduction in Afghanistan, and a further reduction of over £2,000,000 under the head of Frontier Railways.

Mr. CROSS: Yes, Sir; I think the hon. member for Eye must see that money spent on war and frontier railways is at least as irretrievably gone as if it were spent on useful public works. I spoke of gross expenditure.

Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said he understood from the answer of the hon. gentleman that there has been a practical increase of £5,400,000 in the expenditure of India excepting the military expenditure.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY, AUGUST 6.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA IN COUNCIL.

Sir G. BALFOUR asked the Under-Secretary of State for India whether he would lay upon the table of the House a statement in detail of the establishment of the Secretary of State for India in Council, as formed under the first order in Council, and as now formed with the alterations as made in the last order in Council of the 19th of July, 1883, the comparison to show ranks, classes, numbers, rates of salary, and total salaries, with explanations as to increases and decreases.

Mr. CROSS: The India Office under the first Order in Council of 1859 was constituted on a totally different basis to that on which it now stands; but in 1860 it was reorganized on a footing more nearly resembling the present establishment. If my hon. friend will move for a return comparing the India Office as it now is with what it was in 1860 I shall be happy to present it.

RUSSIA AND AFGHANISTAN.

Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the Under-Secretary of State for India whether the Government had received any information regarding the movements of an alleged Russian agent in Afghanistan, who was described in the Standard of Saturday as "having credentials from the Russian Government and as having been very kindly received by the present Governor of Cabul, and as having informed the Governor that 'Russia has for the last four years been contemplating an advance on Hindostan,' and that he himself believed a regular move in that direction will be made within the next two years;" and also that "Russia had sent a number of spies to investigate the best routes and seasons for such an advance;" whether he would lay before Parliament the reports of the agents of the Indian Government in Afghanistan for the past ten years; and whether he could state the present position of the advance guard of the Russian forces north-west of Herat.

Mr. CROSS: The India Office has no information which enables me to confirm the statements in the Standard referred to in the first question of the hon. member for Eye. As to the second question, I must very respectfully decline to present to Parliament the confidential reports of our Agents in Afghanistan. I cannot state the present position of the Russian forces north-west of Herat, but I have no reason to believe that there are any Russian troops stationed beyond the line of the frontier fixed by the Russo-Persian Treaty of December, 1881.

RAILWAYS IN INDIA.

Mr. CARBUTT asked the Under-Secretary of State for India whether the important annual report by Mr. Juland Danvers on railways in India was to be discontinued; whether the Government intended giving in its stead the report by Colonel F. S. Stanton for the year 1882-83; whether it was a fact that Indian railways continue to earn increasing dividends every year; whether the average dividend on all railways in India was, in 1882-83, 5·37 per cent. per annum; 1881-82, 5·15 per cent. per annum; and 1879-80, 4·75 per cent. per annum.

Mr. CROSS: Yes to all the questions.

ALLEN'S INDIAN MAIL.

TUESDAY, AUGUST 14, 1883.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

OUR advices by the overland mail are, from Bombay, July 17; Madras and Allahabad, July 16; Calcutta July 14.

THE Government seems determined to leave no paltry shift untied that affords any hope of bolstering up the wretched Ilbert Bill, or of hiding from the British public the extent of the condemnation it has evoked from every responsible authority in India. It is now stated that the opinions of the local Governments and officials will not be published until they have been submitted to the Secretary of State, that the printing takes a long time, &c., all of which means that Lord Ripon does not intend them to be made public until Parliament is up.

WE have noticed in our leading columns the fact that Professor Max Müller has come forward in the Times to demolish Anglo-Indians generally, and to explain that it was only by "a mere accident" that his own illustrious name was included in Mr. Foggo's somewhat apocryphal list of "Anglo-Indian" supporters of Lord Ripon.

MALICIOUS friends of the worthy professor will smile at the warmth with which he ridicules the pretensions of Anglo-Indians, to know anything about India, and the "strings of titles before and initials after their names." He mentions the titles and the initials twice; and he would probably have mentioned them three times, if Sir Alexander Arbuthnot's Committee had included the name of Boden, Professor of Sanskrit.

PROFESSOR MAX MÜLLER assures us that he writes, not as an Anglo-Indian, but as a "scholar and historian." It is nice to know this.

HE also tells us that it is "the privilege as well as the duty of the scholar and the historian to stand aloof, to choose his own point of observation," &c.—which of course accounts for the pity that the Professor feels for those who are compelled to study Indian subjects in too near proximity to them.

AFTER this, it is a little rough on us Anglo-Indians to be instructed that "the environment in most places where Anglo-Indians gather their experience is English rather than Indian, or, if Indian, decidedly in a metamorphic state through contact with English society." Now, we listen with the respect that politeness demands, when the excellent professor informs us that he is a scholar and historian; but we really cannot assent to his claim of superior knowledge in regard to "the environment in most places where Anglo-Indians gather their experience." This is something very different from the professor's claim to be a scholar and historian. It is a small thing, but it is our own. Besides, he had just told us that an English environment is better than an Indian one—that is, provided it be in England; for his not the great man's own inspiration drawn from an English environment?

THE English environment stands Professor Müller in very good stead when he takes the Calcutta judges in hand. It enables him to make a point which he could not possibly have made if he had any personal knowledge of the subject; and this is the only point that is intelligible in a letter two columns in length.

THE point is this. He triumphs greatly over the inconsistency of the judges in maintaining in one paragraph that "the Mofussil is beyond the reach of public opinion, while here the rapid development of railway and telegraphic communication is insisted on, as allowing European criminals to be easily forwarded to the nearest tribunal where they might be tried by a European judge." If Professor Müller had had six months' experience of any Mofussil district in Bengal, he would have known the judges to be strictly right.

IRISHMEN can well sympathise with the just and reasonable fears of the Bengal landowners at the prospect opened up to them by Lord Ripon's Bengal Tenancy Bill. One of the most influential Irish journals, the Belfast Newsletter, says, in its issue of August 3:—

"It would appear from the nature of a petition which was presented to Parliament yesterday by Mr. Stanhope that the Native landowners of the Bengal Province of India are anxious to save themselves from being, by the passing of the Native Land Bill, reduced to the condition of the Irish landlords under the operations of Mr. Gladstone's brilliant legislative measure. The Maharajah of Behar and other Bengal princes petition Parliament to prevent the passing of the new Bill on the ground that it would revolutionise the relations between the landowners and cultivators, and promote incessant legislation. But, considering that it was the present Government that passed the Irish Land Act, which can undoubtedly be described only in the words of the Indian petitioners as a measure 'calculated to revolutionise the relations between owner and cultivator, and to promote incessant legislation,' the Bengal Bill runs a very good chance of becoming law, unless the Government have found out their mistake of 1881."

THE Indian Mirror says:—The following account of an assault committed by a Sikh student upon a Bengali Assistant Professor, is told by the Lahore correspondent of the Times of India. It may probably gladden the hearts of some of the enemies of the Bengalis:—

"There was rather an unseemly fracas the other day in our University, which ended in one of the Assistant Professors, a Bengali, receiving an unmerciful shoe-beating from a Sikh student. It appears the latter, who was in receipt of a scholarship, had obtained a month's leave, which he overstayed; accordingly, on his return to work, he was taken to task rather sharply by the Assistant Professor. The student grew argumentative and impertinent on it, whereupon the professor, in an evil moment, bade the student, in a kindly spirit, not to make a fool of himself. This remark proved to be the last straw to the camel's back. The irritated student, without further ado, pulled off his shoe and commenced belabouring the pedagogue. Several students then joined in, and a regular mêlée ensued, the professor faring worse the longer the scuffle continued. The appearance of Mr. Parker, the Registrar of the University, on the scene, stopped the shoe-beating performance. The offending Sikh youth was subsequently brought up before Mr. Parker in his judicial capacity, who sentenced him to three months' imprisonment and a fine of Rs.200; he has also been expelled from the University. It is to be hoped that this severe punishment will have a salutary effect on Native students generally. It is a remarkable fact that, although this case caused a deal of local commotion, the Native papers have been perfectly silent about it. Had the offending student been a European, the assault would, I doubt not, have proved the all-absorbing topic of a whole week. The secret of this silence is, I believe, that influence has been used to keep the matter out of the Press, it being thought that if the circumstances of the case became generally known, it would rather dispel the idea of that unity of spirit amongst the Natives which they have lately been at such pains to make an unsuspecting English public believe does prevail amongst them."

Was this assault the result of Mr. Ilbert's Bill, or of "superior instigation?" Mr. Parker deserves great credit for the prompt action taken by him in the matter.

THE Indian Mirror, speaking of the Anglo-Indian agitation against the Ilbert Bill in England, says:—

"Mr. Roper Lethbridge, our former Press Commissioner, is taking a leading part in this unrighteous movement. The Express Commissioner, while here, was a professed friend of the Natives, but he has thought fit to change colours! The loss of his lucrative appointment under Lord Ripon's Government seems to have upset his judgment altogether."

Now we must say frankly that this seems to us to be grossly unfair. Mr. Lethbridge is honestly of opinion (whether rightly or wrongly we need not stay to consider) that Englishwomen should be tried by their own countrymen in the rural districts of India—is there any reason, in this honest opinion, for believing him to be no longer a "friend of the Natives?" Does it afford any just reason for supposing that formerly he was only a "professed" friend of the Natives? Suppose Lord Ripon were to bring in a Bill rendering it compulsory on all Europeans in England to employ Native Doctors—and suppose Mr. Lethbridge were to protest vehemently (as he very probably would) against such empty and base flattery of Natives, and such gratuitous tyranny as against Europeans—would the Indian Mirror thereon conclude that Mr. Lethbridge had “changed his colours” and was no more a friend of the Natives? We hope to see a more manly respect for honest differences of opinion win its way, ere long, among our Native contemporaries.

THE Journal of the Anjuman-i-Punjab, the leading Native journal of the Punjab, has the following very sensible remarks on the Ilbert Bill:—

“The passing of the Bill will not affect British prestige or British influence one jot, though it will annoy the bulk of the European community for no very great compensating gain. The withdrawal of the measure, on the other hand, will not shake British power in the very least, though a few newspapers editors may shriek themselves hoarse over it. The people of this country have too much confidence in their rulers and in their own obligations to them to be violently agitated at the fate of such a measure. The bulk of the people care for none of these things, they want good government and no sensational legislation. So long as they are not misruled by their district officers, and so long as they get justice, they will be satisfied. There are some things, however, which must be handled very carefully, and one of these is the course of appeal. The most ignorant zemindar thinks he has a right to have his grievances heard by the highest authority in the land. If a man is aggrieved with the decisions of the local courts, he shoulders his stick and marches off to the Divisional Court; from thence he sturdily marches on to the Chief Court. One of the things most inexplicable to the Native is the impotence of the Executive Government to interfere with the decisions of even that tribunal, another puzzle to the zemindar is the fact that the Chief Court itself does not possess absolute power, untrammelled by technical laws and rules, to do what it likes with the decisions of the Lower Courts. Any attempt to give finality to the decisions of the Courts below the Chief Courts in land-disputes in this province will be fraught with danger.”

THE Pioneer discusses the Bengal Rent Bill, and in the remarks it makes it says, “it has at least been attempted to hold the balance equally, and not in any way to take up the position of a partisan.” The writer, after a fair examination of the Bill, condemns it in no unequivocal terms. He says:—

“It certainly seems to many that the immediate effect of the Bill, if passed in its present form, will be to increase the friction between landlords and tenants, and to involve them in interminable agitation, which may go far to swamp the administration, and the final up-shot of which Solomon himself could not foretell.”

We are glad to observe that the Pioneer has put its finger upon the real blot of the Bill. The Bill as it stands will set class against class, and flood the country with litigation. Is this a result which a wise ruler should seek to bring about? The same writer makes the following suggestions for the amendment of the Bill:—

“The cry is everywhere for Self-Government. Would it not be possible to make a beginning in this matter by assembling in each district a few average representatives of both classes, and seeing, if they could not come to some practical compromise? The tenants might well afford to give up some of the shadowy advantages held out in the Bill for a smaller measure of protection more absolute and definite. The only sure basis to go on is existing facts. Take rents as they stand, and provide that it shall only be possible to enhance within certain limits and at certain intervals. If, for example, it were laid down generally without distinction of classes that a tenant's rent could only be enhanced once in ten years and that no enhancement could be more than six or four annas in the rupee, according to the principle accepted in section 59, and if the provisions for compensation for ejection now limited to ordinary tenants were made up of general application, such a law would be easily comprehended by the meanest peasant in the country; and if their absolute rights in their home farm-land were secured to the landlords—a point in which they have been somewhat hardly dealt with in the present measure—it is probable that these proposals, if they were not cheerfully accepted, would at any rate not excite any more opposition than the present Bill does. Such a plan indeed would make no pretence to finality; but the practical administrator has to deal with the present time, and not, like the preacher with eternity. A measure which should secure a reasonable amount of protection to the tenants, without impoverishing the landlords, and without deposing them from the position in which for more than three generations they have undoubtedly been placed by the Government, would be monumen enough for any Administration. The fact of such a measure not being theoretically complete, and of its not attempting to look beyond the present generation, is not an objection about which practical men need not trouble themselves.”

The writer however, misses the most important point. The landlords are suffering much from want of a simple procedure for recovery of rent. This want ought to be supplied first.

THE Manchester Courier of August 4, in its London correspondence, has the following on the extraordinary unfairness that seems to mark the attempts of the Government and its supporters to bolster up Lord Ripon's folly:—

“The unfair animus of the Government in connection with the Ilbert Bill is shown by the fact that the very able and exhaustive minute of the High Court judges against that mischievous measure has only just been allowed to come before the English public, although the Viceroy received it nearly two months and a half ago. Mr. Lal Mohun Ghose is a professional agitator, whose opinions are worth just nothing at all. I am told that he was soundly rated after the Bright meeting, for his indiscretion in stating that he and his friends only attach value to the Ilbert Bill as the herald of other and more sweeping changes. He laughed at his admonishers, and replied that it would save time and trouble to speak the truth. The attempt of a few partisans of Mr. Bright to nullify the expression of opinion in the East End on the Ilbert Bill was, I hear, an organised affair. It emanates from one of the Radical clubs of the district, and the original intention was to muster a sufficient number of persons to carry an amendment. The ruling of the chairman put an end to that part of the scheme, and in revenge the Ilbertites resorted to inarticulate noises, which proved quite as ineffectual. It is worth noting in connection with this meeting that no efforts were made to make it exclusive, though its object was definite enough. If the friends of the Bill had been very numerous in the neighbourhood they could easily have subverted the entire proceedings, but they were too few to influence the meeting, though not too few to disturb it.”

THE Englishman gives the following account of the Calcutta Freight Market up to July 21:—

“Although there has not been a large amount of business transacted during the past week, rates, specially for London, have improved slightly owing to better news about produce from home. We fear, however, that as long as the present scarcity of grain and seed continues in our bazaars here, any decided improvement in freights will be difficult to establish. One steamer has been chartered for Continental employment, two ships have been taken up for Liverpool, one for London, and two for New York, but the demand for sailing tonnage is still very restricted. Towards the close another reaction has set in and the market closes very quiet, so that quotations must be taken quite as nominal. For London via Suez Canal.—Rates opened firm, and continued gradually advancing during the week. The Dacca and City of Venice made engagements at 33s. 9d. and 35s. for wheat, and 36s. 3d. for linseed, followed by the Governor, Shannon, City of Venice, and Karamania, all securing 40s. for both wheat and linseed. These latter rates are no longer obtainable. For Liverpool via Suez Canal.—No fresh transactions. For U. K. or Continent via Suez Canal.—Nothing done. For Mediterranean Ports.—The s.s. Crystal secured a full cargo consisting of dead weight at 35s. and light freight at 42s. 6d. For London via Cape.—The only business has been the fixture of the City of Sparta with wheat, linseed, and jute at 40s. For Liverpool via Cape.—The Senator secured a charter at 35s., and the Mabel took the berth with half a cargo of wheat and linseed at 36s. 3d. For Dundee via Cape.—Nothing done. For U. K. or Continent via Cape.—Nothing done. For America.—The Orchomene and Desdemona have been chartered for assorted cargoes at $7½. For the country trade.—There has been nothing further done. Our unfixed tonnage stands at 42,943 tons.”

WITH respect to the Tea Market, we take the following from Messrs. Balmer, Lawrie, and Co.'s Indian Tea and Weather Report:—

“Since our last report, which was dated 7th instant, there has been little change in the state of the weather in most of the tea-growing districts; managers, as a rule, are still unable to pick up the ground lost at the beginning of the season, although there are a few fortunate gardens ahead of last year. The tea made, however, although less in quantity, is of a rather better quality on the whole than last season up to this, so that good prices should rule throughout the season. Assam.—Dibrugarh.—Towards the end of last month, a want of rain was felt generally over this district, but this month has opened favourably, as there has been some heavy rain together with a good deal of sunny weather; a few days were very hot and others rather cool, but altogether the temperature has been satisfactory; cattle disease is reported from some villages, but the health of the coolies is good; the price of rice is rather high. Jaipore.—The present month commenced with intensely hot and dry days; on the 22nd a smart thunderstorm burst over the district and since the air has been cooler, and more rain was expected; the rainfall is about  $1\frac{1}{2}$  inches more than up to the same time last year, but less by 10 inches than the two previous years. Sibsagar.—The weather here has been, on the whole, very favourable for tea, though rather dry and hot; a heavy storm was experienced on 2nd instant, and about 3 inches of rain fell; on the 7th and 8th July also good showers fell and fair flushes were being got, but gardens are still behind last year. Unfavourable reports reach us from this part; curiously local rains have fallen on same gardens entirely avoiding other closely adjacent ground, so that parts of even one estate may be ahead of last year, and parts far behind; if rain fell generally, a rush of leaf would probably take place; the heat at present is excessive. Lakhimpore.—Welcome showers have favoured this part lately, and the weather has been altogether favourable for both growth and manufacture; blight is disappearing, and some gardens are beginning to pull up, while others still remain far behind last year in outturn. There is a good deal of sickness about among both Europeans and natives. Nowgong.—Fairly good weather has reigned over this locality lately, it is hot and dry, and rain would do good. Mungledie.—The weather here has been very like that at Nowgong, fairly good for growth, but rain is much wanted; no rice spring crops have yet shown themselves. Cachar.—The weather has been seasonable for leaf growing, but too damp for withering, a considerable amount of tea has been made on some estates; most gardens are still suffering from blight, and some are quite shut up on that account. Darjeeling.—Since the 7th instant the heat here has been very great, the thermometer ranging from eighty-one deg. to eighty-seven deg. in the shade; the slight showers at night have been good for the flushes, and the weather altogether favourable for manufacturing and plucking, but too sunny for transplanting with safety. On some gardens the flushes are rather thin, but the leaf being of good quality, makes very fine tea; red spider is complained of on some estates, and many gardens are behind their estimates, and not likely to pick up to any extent. A good deal of sickness and fever prevails among the coolies. Kumaon.—Since our last report the weather here has been generally favourable; high temperature and sunshine, with a fair amount of rain. Some excellent leaf and first real flushes of the season are showing themselves now on some estates. Kangra Valley.—Since the bursting of the monsoon, on the 26th ultimo, rain has been very plentiful, about 22 inches having fallen on the 13th instant; the breaks of sunshine having hardly been sufficient, but the bushes on the whole are budding and flushing well; the weather being close and muggy.”

THE Times of India gives the following obituary for the week ending July 24:—Mr. W. Powell, chief of the workshops of the Assam Railway and Trading Company; Mr. J. R. Oughterson, agent of the Alleppey Branch of the Madras Bank; Dr. Curesjee Framjee Khory, Bombay; Rai Gopal Chunder Sircar Bahadoor, the well-known Bengali pleader of Bhagulpore; Putlibai, the infant daughter of H.H. the Gaekwar of Baroda; Mr. H. J. McGlone, superintendent of the office of the Inspector general of police, N.W.P.

THE WEATHER AND THE CROPS.

THE following is the official summary of the Agricultural Department's reports on the weather and crops throughout India, for the week ended on the 10th July:—

“Rain in varying quantities, heaviest on the south-west and north-east coasts, has fallen throughout the Madras Presidency. In Mysore the fall is still insufficient for standing crops, but Coorg has received a plentiful supply. The rains over the districts of the Bombay Presidency, Berars, Central India, and Rajputana have, with few exceptions, been favourable and sufficient. In Guzerat the fall has been heavy: river floods have caused great damage in Surat; a break is required. The Indus is rising in Sind, and prospects have improved. Parts of the Southern Mahratta country are still in need of more rain. A break would be beneficial in Indore, but rain is beginning to be urgently wanted in Marwar in Rajputana, where the tanks are all dry and water is obtained with great difficulty. In Burma and Assam the weather continues favourable, but for the time of the year the rainfall is below the average, particularly in the former province. The cessation of heavy rain in Bengal noticed last week has become more marked, the average fall being under two inches, except in Orissa and at Calcutta and Hazaribagh. Heavy and seasonable rain has fallen throughout the Central Provinces. The North-Western Provinces and Oudh have also received a moderate supply during the week, but more is required in several districts. Rain still holds off in the Punjab, hardly any having fallen between Delhi and Amritsar; elsewhere the fall has averaged under an inch and a half. Harvesting is still in progress in Madras and Mysore. The rice crops of the districts on the west coast are being weeded and transplanted, and promise well. Ploughing and sowing for the kharif continue everywhere, but are backward in parts of the North-Western Provinces and Oudh and the Punjab for want of rain. In Assam and Bengal the prospects of the rice crops are on the whole favourable, but more rain is necessary to admit of transplanting on high lands in Bengal. Harvesting of jute and early rice has commenced in a few places in the latter province, and the condition of standing crops of jute, indigo, and sugarcane is satisfactory. Some damage has been done to crops in Surat by the floods, and danger from a similar cause is apprehended in Orissa, where the rains have been heavy. Locusts continue to threaten the crops of several districts of the Bombay Presidency, and their appearance is also reported in one of the Central India States. Fever is generally prevalent, and the mortality from cholera is still severe in Poona and Ahmednagar in Bombay, and Wardha in the Central Provinces. Prices are for the most part stationary, with a tendency to rise in the North-Western Provinces and the Punjab.”

TELEGRAPHIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE following is the usual weekly telegram from the Times correspondent, dated Calcutta, August 12:—

“It is stated that the official opinions pronounced upon Mr. Ilbert's Bill will not be published until after they have reached the Secretary of State. The work of printing them seems to proceed very slowly, and there is little chance of their arriving in England before the close of the Parliamentary session. This delay has caused much disappointment. It is generally felt that it would be more dignified for the Government at once to withdraw the Bill, in deference to the almost unanimous reports of its officers, than to attempt to throw their responsibility upon the Secretary of State.

“The Simla correspondent of the Calcutta Statesman, a journal which has hitherto been the strongest supporter of the Bill, admits that the unanimity of hostile opinions upon the subject is remarkable, especially in the provinces which will be chiefly affected by the passing of the measure. The same correspondent says that several suggested compromises have been sent up from Bombay, but of such varying nature that although they show certain officials to be in favour of a modified Bill, they also prove the difficulty, if not the impossibility, of arriving at any satisfactory solution of the problem. The mischief, he goes on to say, already caused between the two races is irreparable; and although further immediate mischief may be avoided by modifying the Bill, still any compromise can only be tentative, and the whole question will be reopened a few years hence, with possibly greater friction than now exists.

“It is understood that the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal has submitted a Minute, in which he altogether disproves the administrative inconvenience theory advanced by the Supreme Government. He shows that there are only six native covenanted civilians in Lower Bengal, three of them very junior in standing; and as the province contains forty-five districts, there can be no difficulty in providing for these six officers without hardship to them. It is believed that Mr. Rivers Thompson also questions the fitness of natives to try Europeans on the ground that they are likely to be overawed by the position of European offenders and the pressure of local public opinion. An American missionary is the only non-Asiatic among the persons consulted by the Bengal Government who has expressed an opinion in favour of the Bill. Nineteen native officials also advocate it. On the other hand, fifty-nine officers, comprising practically the whole of the superior judicial and executive services, and including several natives, are more or less strongly opposed to the measure. The Lieutenant Governor, replying to an address presented to him by the Municipality of Hooghly last Tuesday, referred to the Bill. His words have especial interest, as being the only public utterance on this subject by any high official since the debate on the 9th of March last. Mr. Rivers Thompson said:—

“No one can deplore more than I do the differences between Europeans and natives, which have found such severe expression during the past few months. It is impossible to say whether the Europeans began them. But there is the fact that they were begun, and have found strong expression, especially in Bengal. I should be glad if the cause of this animosity were removed. It seems to me to be based on a very small matter; so much so, that if the Bill became law it would confer a privilege at present on only two natives, while on the other hand it would offend the susceptibilities, and I am inclined to think the just susceptibilities, of a very large class. Therefore, in whatever way it might be, I should be very glad if that cause of dispute were removed. I should be glad, because it turns away attention from the proper development of those just reforms to which the Governments of India and of Bengal attach very great importance.

"At a meeting of the European and Anglo-Indian Defence Association held in the Town-hall on Monday last, several speeches on the present position of affairs, all marked by great moderation, were delivered by the president and other gentlemen. It was unanimously resolved—"That, in the true interests of the European and native communities, it is imperative upon this association to oppose the Bill by all constitutional means."

"At the half-yearly meeting of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce, held on Tuesday last, the President, Mr. Keswick, dwelt at some length upon the question of railway extension in India. He referred to the great waste of time involved in references to various authorities and endeavours to make antagonistic elements agree. If railway construction by private enterprise was to succeed in India, the promoters must be assured that protracted delays would not occur in sanctioning the work. He also referred to the delay in building the Hooghly Railway Bridge, and said that the site selected was most inconvenient, which result was due to the fact that the mercantile community had not been consulted in the matter. He urged the Chamber to take action in order to obtain an increase of facilities and a reduction of the charges levied at the port of Calcutta.

"Work has at last been begun on the railway bridge over the Indus, at Sukkur. It is intended that the bridge shall cross the river by a single span of 830 feet.

"The Lahore Civil and Military Gazette is responsible for the statement that the Punjab postal authorities have lately seized a number of seditious letters addressed to certain persons in Umritsur and containing pieces of black cloth, which were to be worn, the writer said, in mourning for Surrendronath Bannerjee, the Calcutta journalist, who was lately imprisoned for contempt of court. Distinctly seditious references are also made to the approaching visit of the Maharajah Dhuleep Singh to India. It seems to be not unlikely that some use may be made of the Maharajah's name by disaffected persons. A telegram from Simla states that the prospect of his visit is causing considerable excitement among the native community, especially the Sikhs, and that probably he will not be permitted to approach the Punjab.

"The continued drought is causing anxiety throughout a large portion of the North-West Provinces and the Punjab. Unless there be a plentiful fall of rain within the next fortnight agricultural prospects will be seriously clouded in the districts of Gurgaon, Rohtuk, Sirsa, Hissar, and part of Perozepore.

"A serious accident occurred in Calcutta on Tuesday morning last through the fall of a portion of a hide scouring warehouse, by which five coolies were killed, and some twelve or fourteen others injured. The building collapsed just as the coolies were going to work. Had the accident been delayed for a few minutes longer, the number of victims would have been very much larger. An inquest upon the bodies of the dead is now proceeding.

"The Punjab authorities have some hopes that the Kohat Afridis will reconsider their determination to close the Pass. The prospect of losing their allowances is influencing a portion of the tribe. A Lahore newspaper states that a Russian merchant, who had been staying for some time at Cabul, has arrived in the Ameer's camp at Mamakheyl, near Gandamak, and had an interview with Abdurrahman. It adds that the merchant asserts the presence of many Russian spies in Afghanistan."

MR. BRIGHT'S SLANDERS.

PERHAPS no public man expresses strong opinions in stronger language than does Mr. John Bright. Certainly the opinions of no public man are more distorted by prejudice or based on more inaccurate information. The errors and misstatements which in other men he would denounce as "lies" are in his case tolerated as petty indiscretions. A neat little exposure of Mr. Bright's inaccuracy is made by Mr. Branson, of the Calcutta Bar, in connection with the dogmatic speech delivered the other day in defence of the Ilbert Bill. Always prone to attribute unworthy motives to all who differ from him, Mr. Bright declares that much of the agitation against the bill was due to the conduct and action of the lawyers in Calcutta, and that their hostility was owing to the fact of their having had, what he calls, two very unpleasant pills to swallow—one in the shape of the appointment of a native member of the bar to the office of standing counsel to the Government of India, and the other in the appointment of a native lawyer of eminence, himself a judge of the High Court, to officiate as Chief Justice of Bengal, both of which offices Mr. Bright supposes that European members of the Calcutta Bar were longing for and were angry at not getting. Mr. Branson shows that both statements are flagrant inaccuracies. The office of standing counsel to the Government was offered to and declined by three Europeans before it was given to Mr. Bonnerjee, and so far from there being any jealousy of that gentleman, he is spoken of as an excellent lawyer and advocate, and deservedly holds a very high position at the Calcutta Bar, with the European members of which he is on the best of terms. As regards the judicial arrangements, Mr. Branson shows that so far from there being any professional jealousy, the appointment was the only one which the judicial system admitted of. Thus in his two specific cases Mr. Bright is altogether wrong, and what is worse, mischievously wrong. Mr. Branson's concluding comment is pithy and caustic:—"The whole of the rest of Mr. Bright's speech bristles with inaccuracies, and his views regarding the bill, its nature, its scope, and its objects are so directly in opposition to the statements on the same subject of Lord Ripon and Mr. Ilbert themselves that one wonders how a gentleman in Mr. Bright's position could satisfy himself with 'asking a gentleman intimately acquainted with the affairs of India' to give him 'briefly a little account of what this bill seeks to do,' in place of taking the trouble to read the bill itself, and at all events the statements of its authors, before standing up to inveigh against the conduct of those whose opinions, according to Mr. Bright himself, are weighty enough to demand even his consideration."—Sheffield Daily Telegraph.

NOTICES OF BOOKS.

DR. POPE'S TAMIL HANDBOOK. *

THIS masterly work requires no introduction to our readers. For many years it has been the one authority and guide to would-be students of the beautiful, but certainly difficult Tamil languages. The learned author has recently retired from India; but is spending his well-earned leisure in carefully amending and improving his famous work. The fourth edition is now before us, and as we have carefully compared each line with the former edition, we can testify to the care with which the present book has been amended, enlarged, corrected and improved. The work has now assumed what may be taken to be its final form, and it gives the accumulated results of the long years of study and patient investigation of its enthusiastic and scholarly author. It deserves mention, also, that this is the first Tamil book ever printed in England. Small extracts, examination papers, and such like have often been produced, but this is the first time that an entire book on Tamil and with the native characters has been printed in this country. In all probability a generation or more will elapse before another scholar will arise capable of bringing out a work that can supersede the excellent book of Dr. Pope.

AN ARABIC GRAMMAR.*

THIS ingenious little book deserves the favour with which it has been received; for the Author has made a bold attempt to simplify that very complete subject, Arabic Grammar. He has to an extent succeeded by the simple process of omitting the difficulties. The fifteen or sixteen examples with which the subject of broken plurals is illustrated and dismissed, will scarcely be deemed satisfying by any learner of the language. The same may be said of the seven pages devoted to Syntax; and the four short Exercises, which comprise all that is given by way of reading lessons. The book is, however, strong in Dialogues, to which forty-four pages are given. This is, in all probability, the part of the book which has found favour with the public; and the Syrian author is here quite at home. The Dialogues are decidedly good, consisting simply of colloquial sentences on various subjects, to be learnt by heart, and used as needed. No attempt has been made to produce imaginary conversations, which invariably contain a superfluity of "Yes and No" padding, and can never be brought into real use. These ready-made conversations break down on the first unexpected answer; and remind one of the tale told in the East of a deaf man who arranged before-hand the conversation he intended to have with a sick person. As the invalid did not give the anticipated replies, the deaf man's ready-made rejoinders became absurdly inappropriate. Faris Ash-Shidyāq ends his book with a vocabulary containing about 3,000 very common, and therefore very useful, words. The defect of the book is that there is not enough of it to give any practically valuable knowledge of Arabic. In this respect it contrasts unfavourably with Palmer's "Arabic Manual," a work of similar design. This latter book, in almost the same compass, gives a really sound and tolerably complete knowledge of both the classical and the colloquial forms of Arabic, with numerous Exercises, transliterated, analysed, and thoroughly explained; adding specimens of various styles of letter-writing, leases, bills of exchange, &c. But we can certainly say of Faris that his book is good, as far as it goes.

CORRESPONDENCE.

EQUALITY.

TO THE EDITOR OF ALLEN'S "INDIAN MAIL."

SIR,—Mr. Bright's recent speech on the Ilbert Bill was highly characteristic and oratorical; as was also Mr. Forster's. But as neither gentleman can pretend to any practical knowledge of India, it was necessary to call in the services of Mr. Ghose. Thus two negatives and an affirmative carried conviction to the minds of an audience ready for the inspirations of such knowledge of the subject as could be imparted by those who knew nothing themselves, beyond theories based upon wrong premises; or who, each for his own special object, relied on personal influence, rather than argument, in convincing those who had made up their minds beforehand to be convinced, and not one of whom in twenty could, probably, have given an intelligible account of the rise of the British Empire in India.

There are men who excel in promoting revolutions and are the first to be swallowed up in it. While "words" only are required, they are in the foremost rank. But it may be questioned, whether the educated Bengalis, of whom we hear so much, would attempt to reap the whirlwind after having sowed the wind; and, whether, were matters to develop into real action, their supporters would show in the field, such daring as they display upon the platform. There is a wide gap between words and blows; and it would be curious to know, in certain cases, who would have the courage of their asserted convictions.

But, without going so far, we may ask, whether, in the cause of "equality," either Mr. Bright or Mr. Forster, would relieve the industries of India of the disadvantages under which they labour, for instance, by the competition of Manchester.

Again, if this cry for "equality" were sincere, why do not these orators claim for the Natives of India, the benefit of Habeas Corpus, and their direct representation in the British Parliament by members of their own race?

But even the French are, after all, more liberal in their colonial representation than our English patrons of the poor natives of India; while neither Lord Ripon, nor Lord Kimberley have yet proposed to amalgamate the nobility of India with the British Peerage.

THE PROPOSED NATIONAL FUND.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "INDIAN MIRROR."

SIR,—The outburst of national feeling on the occasion of Babu Surendra Nath Bannerji's imprisonment led me to think that a proposal for a National Fund will not be altogether inopportune. The eagerness with which the idea has been welcomed, and the earnestness with which some of our great men have already set themselves to work, sufficiently show that my countrymen have felt the necessity for such a fund, and that they are truly anxious for the amelioration of this poor country. I, therefore, venture to put before the public a skeleton sketch of the plan which, in my opinion, may be adopted for successfully carrying out the idea.

In the first place, a public meeting ought to be convened in Calcutta as soon as practicable. Babu Surendra Nath Bannerji, Mr. A. M. Bose, the Secretary of the Indian Association, and Babu Norendra Nath Sen ought to sign the requisition, asking gentlemen from different parts of India to be present at the meeting. With the consent of the majority, a General Committee ought to be formed, and representative men of all parts of India ought to be elected members. A Managing Committee should also be formed and the members of the Managing Committee should be appointed Trustees of the proposed fund. The objects, with which the Fund is being raised, should be distinctly stated. The objects should be the following:—

1. To have a permanent delegate in England to represent to our rulers there the true state of this country, and to agitate Indian questions.

The growing importance of India in the eyes of our rulers, the interest which some of the leading Members of Parliament are taking in Indian matters, and also the persistent endeavour of many of the Anglo-Indians to frustrate measures calculated to raise us in the scale of social and political progress, urgently require such a delegation.

2. To adopt suitable means for the purpose of imparting political education to the people of India, and for this purpose to have a staff of "political missionaries" whose duty would be, among other things, to establish People's Associations, Shop-keepers' Associations and the like, wherever practicable.

3. To encourage national trade and industry by annually awarding medals, prizes and certificates to inventors of machines of practical importance, and to authors of Treatises on Arts and Science, &c.

4. To adopt means for the creation of good feeling between the different religious sects of India.

Separate Sub-Committees should be formed to carry out the various objects mentioned above.

When we have done with the aforesaid preliminaries, we should take steps to establish Branch Associations in different parts of India, and means should be adopted for raising subscriptions to constitute a National Fund.

We can fairly commence business, if we succeed in securing a yearly income of Rs. 24,000 only. Six lacs of rupees, invested in 4 per Cent Government Promissory Notes, would give us the required income, and if my countrymen will remember that the Anglo-Indians, who do not form even a millionth part of the Indian population, have raised a lac of rupees for their Defence Fund, the raising of six lacs would be no difficult task to us.

The following means, among others, I should suggest for augmenting the Fund when once constituted:—

1. We ought to have National Fund Boxes opened in all the important towns and villages, and people ought to be impressed with the idea that they ought, on all auspicious occasions, such as marriages, &c., contribute something towards the National Fund.

2. National Fund Boxes ought to be placed in every Law Court in India, and the legal practitioners ought to be requested to ask their clients, who win their cases, to contribute towards the National Fund, according to their means. If the legal practitioners will be but true to the cause and faithful to their country, money will flow in like water.

3. The 4th day of May, the day of Surendra Nath's imprisonment, ought to be commemorated in his honour, and every good son of India ought to contribute something to the National Fund on that auspicious day. I would recommend the observance of the 4th May, as on that day the foundation of National Unity was laid and the seed of National Life was sown.

4. No one in this country denies alms to the poor. If every one of us will but remember that our poor Motherland has become poorer than the poorest mortal who goes a-begging from door to door, and, remembering it, if every one of us would keep either a kalsi (pot) or a box in his house, and make it a strict rule to put daily a handful of rice in the kalsi or a pice in the box, and at the end of every six months or so send the accumulations, or their value, to the Secretary of the National Fund Committee, the cause of poor India will no more suffer for want of funds.

One word of request to Babu Surendra Nath, and I have done for the day. The nation is rejoicing at his release from the gaol; the better feelings of the Indians have been aroused from long dormant sleep; if Surendra Babu will now go about the country and appeal to the patriotism of the Indians, a National Fund will be an accomplished fact. The iron is hot; now is the time to strike.—Yours, &c.,

Krishnaghar, July 6th.

TARAPADA BANNERJI.

THE "SPECTATOR" ON THE ILBERT BILL.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."

SIR,—It is with no small surprise that I have read, in the Spectator of August 4, an introductory paragraph on the so-called Bill, which describes that Bill as one "permitting a few Native Judges, who are members of the Covenanted Civil Service—i.e., who have been educated here and gone back to India under the same conditions as our own Indian Civil Servants—to try Europeans accused of crimes." Will you allow me to assure you that the Bill might with equal accuracy be described as one which is to permit Native Judges who are not members of the Covenanted Civil Service, and who have not been educated here, &c.? I trust you will not consider me captious, when I say that it has caused me profound regret to be obliged to believe that you have approved a Bill, and have condemned its opponents, without knowing its contents. If community of error could excuse such a course, you would be free from blame. Your introductory paragraph confirms the impression made upon the Times reporter by Mr. Bright's speech. Those who have read the Bill are compelled to believe that Mr. Bright has failed in that accuracy, which may, I hope, without injustice, be called intellectual truthfulness. The Edinburgh Scotsman gives unmistakable evidence of the same fact. By a singular coincidence, my private experience has been that in the only instances in which I have discussed the Bill with any of its supporters (three thorough-going advocates), I found, at the tail-end of the debate, that not one knew its contents.

Pardon me for telling you that the Bill proposes to confer powers of jurisdiction over Englishmen upon four new classes of Judges, viz.:—(1), Native Covenanted Civilians; (2), Statutory Civilians; (3), Assistant Commissioners; (4), Cantonment Magistrates. It is the first class which has exclusively attracted the attention of the English supporters of the Bill. It is singular that the second and third, of which nothing is heard in England, should be those which have fixed the attention and opposition of those Anglo-Indians who do not base their objections to the Bill upon race distinctions. No one is disturbed by the fourth class; it is not likely ever to include any but Englishmen.

Will you allow me shortly to state my reasons for objecting to this Bill? As I am one of the rank and file of Anglo-Indians, they may, without substantial error, be taken as those of a considerable class.

We are absolutely opposed to the trial of Europeans by officials belonging to the second and third classes. These classes are filled from the ranks of Orthodox Hindu and Mahomedan families. Their members do not know anything of English society, and they are not educated in England. The deep repugnance, on social grounds, of which the Bill has provoked the expression is, amongst those with whom I agree, in no way personal. It is not that of Englishmen towards natives of India. It rests on a radical fact,—the antagonism of diverse social systems. It is easy, I believe, for Englishmen to realise that their own feelings towards Mahomedanism and Hinduism are intensified in the case of no inconsiderable section of Anglo-Indian society,—its women.

With reference to the first class—Native Covenanted Civilians—our objections are based on different, and, we hope, less irremovable, grounds. In their case, we think the proposal premature. They are too few and too young in the service to have created any general opinion whatsoever concerning themselves. If time had been allowed, we think it possible that they would have won the confidence of those Anglo-Indians who knew them personally, the mass of adverse opinion would have been leavened, and we should have been spared many causes for regret which have been created by a too hasty attempt at legislation.

May I, in conclusion, say, with reference to the general principle of the Bill, that many of its opponents are possessed by the opinion that the question of the trial of Anglo-Indians is primarily an Anglo-Indian question, and that in only a secondary manner does it concern the English at home, or the Natives of India? We do not think it just or reasonable, in any case, that power of trial should be given to such Judges as have not, from whatever cause, the confidence of the class to be tried. —I am, Sir, &c.,

AN ENGLISHWOMAN.

[We were intending, in the paragraph referred to, to summarise Mr. Bright's speech, and not to describe the Bill itself, which we had discussed elsewhere. On referring to the paragraph, however, we see that the sentence, intended only to condense Mr. Bright's account of the Bill, appeared to come from ourselves, and we regret the blunder.—Ed. Spectator.]

THE INDIAN CRIMINAL PROCEDURE BILL.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "TIMES."

SIR,—Judges neither in India nor elsewhere are measurable by their jurisdiction, but by their merit. A peremptory challenge to a juror may proceed solely from the defendant's distrust. The allowance of it by the law is in favorem vita, and implies no disesteem of jurors or juror. I entertain no distrust whatever nor fear of miscarriage by native Judges, if well selected. I, therefore, if a defendant, should challenge none; but if my co-defendant did, why should I seek to deprive him of his peremptory challenge? This remnant of the law, whatever you call it—privilege, or by whatever other name—is virtually in the nature of a peremptory challenge. Nobody would have offended me by objecting to my being summoned on the Judicial Committee on an appeal in a given case merely because I was not a native Judge, supposing such a ground of challenge had been tenable. If a Hindoo, or Mahomedan, or other native Judge is taught to confound extent of jurisdiction with judicial fitness, he will so far have been led astray and made to imbibe false notions of his office and dignity. Nobody, in truth, can degrade him but himself. Why should any one suppose the trial of a European more difficult to try in India than that of a native? The challenger may be ignorant, prejudiced, or stupid; the challenged eminently in all things his superior. Is, then, the challenged self-abased or generally lowered by the allowance of a peremptory challenge? Insults to Judges and comparative estimates of Judges do not seem elements in this inquiry. Suppose it were proposed in England to try all criminals by a Judge without Jury. Would any one, by suggesting that the Judge would probably try them better, calm the ferment of men's minds at the bare proposal? The reality and strength of sentiments, and not their abstract reasonableness, generally determine questions of expediency as to overpowering or yielding to them. This particular privilege has no connection whatever with dominion or high hand; it came in originally by concession from native power, grew and prevailed where no lex loci existed, and is as completely the result of the force of circumstances, usage, and custom as any law of any kind that exists in India. To make it now seem offensive to natives and derogatory to native Judges is simply giving a bad name and executing on the misnomer.—I have the honour to be, Sir, your obedient servant,

LAURENCE PEEL.

THE GOVERNMENT AND THE AFFAIRS OF INDIA.

The following letter has appeared in the Times :—

SIR,—With regard to my motion upon Lord Ripon's Indian policy, I shall be obliged if you will allow me to make the following statements :—

(1.) That my motion had the express approbation of the Conservative leaders, and that a party whip was sued for it.

(2.) That the Government promised to make a House, and that several Conservative members were told by the Ministerial whips that they need not hurry down because "a House was certain."

(3.) That within five minutes of the "count" there were over fifty members at the House, and that there would have been a large attendance a little later on. The Speaker came in with great punctuality, and the count was moved before he fairly got into the chair.

(4.) That the Government, who have taken every moment from private members except the miserable three or four hours late on Friday night, are according to Parliamentary usage, bound to at least make a House at nine on Friday.

Of course, it is difficult for a private member to get forty members together at nine o'clock on Friday night in August.

Trusting to Ministerial assurances and to the general confidence in there being a House, I did not ask my friends to come down early. However, I fully admit the rashness of placing any confidence in the good faith of the present Ministry. Nor do I grudge the small triumph which some have taken in Friday's proceedings.—I have the honour to remain, Sir, your obedient servant,

E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT.

He commanded the same battery at the battle of Charasiah, but shortly afterwards returned to India on promotion.

The following transfers of medical officers have been made:—Surgeon Mawson, from 27th N.I., to officiating medical charge, 14th B. L.; Surgeons Sedgfield and Hawkins, both doing duty at Morar, to officiating medical charge of the 27th and 39th N.I., respectively.

There is to be a musketry school at Poona this monsoon on a limited scale, and in connection with the annual rifle meeting; that is to say, the native officers and non-commissioned officers who are sent from the various regiments to compete at the rifle meeting will be despatched to Poona early in August, so as to go through a course of instruction under the Assistant Adjutant General for Musketry and his staff. As this convenient arrangement will not entail any expense on the State, it will not be open to any objection on the part of the Government of India. On the contrary, the authorities in Bengal might take a hint from the action of the military authorities in this Presidency, who, under the energetic rule of the present Commander in Chief, lose no opportunity of giving instruction, both theoretical and practical, to the Bombay Army. The great School of Musketry which was to have been established in Bengal seems to hang fire, but a good deal might be done there, as well as in Bombay, by adopting existing means to the desired end. The arrangements for the rifle meeting are now complete, the prospectus is issued, and the gathering bids fair to be a most successful one.

The Military Secretary to the Government of India has issued the formal notification of the abolition of instructors of musketry and of sergeant instructors from July 1. In regard to the latter, it is notified that they will receive the staff pay of their appointments until they are otherwise provided for. This is as it should be, but why cannot a little consideration be shown to the officers who also lose their appointments? By the mere fact of granting this concession to the sergeants, the authorities acknowledge that there is a certain amount of hardship involved in the abolition, and therefore it seems only right that they should take the case of the officers into consideration. It is true that the order only affects a small body of men, but they are deserving of some recognition at the hands of the authorities. A musketry instructor recently wrote to a contemporary asking that the date of abolishing these appointments might be altered to Oct. 1, so that he and others similarly situated might at least enjoy their two months' privilege leave before being deprived of their allowances, and we cannot see why this very reasonable request should not be granted.

The next military competitive examination of lieutenants of militia for commissions in the line will be held on Sept. 19 and 20. Forty vacancies will be offered for competition.

Sanction has been given by the Government for the concentration of troops at divisional headquarters for field exercises during the ensuing cold weather, at Rawul Pindi, Meerut, and Umballa.

The Government of India have expressed their concurrence in the proposal of the Commander in Chief that officers of over seven years' service should be considered ineligible for appointment to the Bengal Commissariat Department. They have further decided that no officer shall in future be appointed to the Bengal Commissariat Department until he has completed three years' service.

The Government of India have ruled that the widow of an officer who dies from wounds not received while in the actual performance of military duty, has no claim to the special rates of pension or compassionate allowances for herself or children, and that nothing more than the ordinary rates of pension can be allowed.

The Inniskilling Dragoons, now at the Cape, are on the roster to come out to India to relieve the 10th Hussars next autumn. As the latter regiment moves this winter to Mhow, the Inniskillings will in all probability relieve the 10th at that station, which unfortunately, an up-country papers remarks, has anything but pleasant association for the gallant 6th Dragoons. It was just before this regiment went home from its last tour of Indian service that, when stationed at Mhow, the memorable court-martial on Paymaster Smale was held. It may still be in the recollection of some of our readers how the whole regiment was divided against itself over the cause célèbre. The issue of the trial was that Captain Smales, in spite of the sympathy of nearly the whole of the regiment, was cashiered; but subsequently, on an appeal to Parliament, was restored to his rank, but placed on retired pay. The rancour exhibited between the Colonel and his senior officers over this case resulted in Colonel Crawley's removal from the command, and the transfer from the regiment of the senior Major to the 15th Hussars, of which regiment, however, he soon after obtained command, when it was at Meerut. As an offshoot of this trial an attempt was made to implicate Colonel Crawley for the death of the Sergeant-Major of the Inniskillings. The Colonel, it was alleged, had subjected the non-commissioned officer to undue severity while in confinement in the guard-room in the hot months. Under special orders from home, Colonel Crawley was tried by court-martial on this charge, but was acquitted.

The Government of India have ordered that so long as there is a supernumerary officer with any regiment no first probationer for the Staff Corps should be appointed.

THE HYDERABAD CONTINGENT.—On the abolition of the medical store department at Secunderabad in 1874, it was arranged that the stations of Bolarum and Raichore were to be supplied with medical stores from the Madras depot, and the remaining stations from Bombay. The Deputy Surgeon-General at Secunderabad has now recommended that the supply of medical stores to all the corps of the Hyderabad Contingent may be obtained from the Bombay depot, in supersession of the arrangement already sanctioned by the Government of India. The recommendation appears to be advisable, and the sanction of the Government of India has accordingly been solicited. Sanction has also been requested for the adoption in the Hyderabad Contingent of the station hospital system in a modified form as recommended by the Deputy Surgeon-General, and approved by the Brigadier-General commanding the force. The Government of India have sanctioned the supply of medical Stores from the Bombay Medical Store Depot to to all the corps of the Hyderabad Contingent,—Madras Mail.

COURT-MARTIAL.—Gunner Thomas Williams, R.A., was charged before a District Court-martial with—(1st) disobeying a lawful command given by his superior officer; (2nd) stealing goods, the property of a comrade; (3rd) receiving, knowing them to be stolen goods, the property of a comrade. The Court found the prisoner guilty of all the charges, and sentenced him to be imprisoned with hard labour for six months. Brigadier General R. Mallaby, commanding Bombay District, made the following order on the proceedings:—"I confirm the finding and sentence on first and second charges, but not on the third, and I also confirm the sentence."

BOMBAY DOCK EXTENSION.—The scheme for providing an extension of the wet dock accommodation in Bombay, which was so much required, has at last assumed a practical form. The Port Trust has submitted its report to the Chamber of Commerce for their opinion, after the receipt of which it will be forwarded to Government for sanction. The plan preferred by the Committee and the Trust is to construct a new dock, separate from the existing one, and with an entrance of its own direct from the harbour. The site chosen is where the present Musjid and Nicol-bunders stand, so that the new dock will be nearer to the Fort than the Prince's. The quay space of the new dock is intended to afford berths for 19 vessels. There are to be three jetties, each 400 feet long. It is proposed to make the level of the entrance sill and floor of the dock two feet lower than those of the Prince's Dock. The rough estimate of cost of the whole work is Rs. 84,86,560, including interest at 4 per cent. during construction.—Englishman.

A correspondent of the Bombay Gazette writes:—"Instead of investing Native magistrates with full power to fine and imprison European offenders, is it not possible to invest approved men with power to fine only, say up to Rs. 200, but not to imprison? Most Europeans could pay such a fine, and they would have the right of appeal against the decision. This concession would meet the claims founded on administrative convenience. Graver offences might easily be referred to the nearest European magistrate, who has power to imprison for three months and to fine up to Rs. 1,000, and who, as a rule, is to be found within two days' journey of any part of India. Native magistrates need not be invested with the power to commit Europeans to the Sessions, for in such cases the accused would most likely have to be kept in gaol for a month pending trial. Nor should they have the power to require security to keep the peace or to be of good behaviour, for in places where Europeans are few the accused would find some difficulty in getting security, and would be liable to be sent to gaol simply because he had no friends near enough to assist him. As an administrative measure it would be better to have European magistrates in large towns, cantonments, and places where Europeans are generally resident in large numbers. When the session judge is a native, he might try Europeans with the aid of two European assessors, or with a jury of whom four out of five should be Europeans if it is not possible to have all five Europeans."

FEMALE MEDICAL STUDENTS.—At a meeting of the Grant College Medical Society on the 11th inst., Dr. Blanc made some remarks on this subject, and moved that "the society, concurring with the views expressed by the President in his address, would be glad to see the students of the College sent to different hospitals in Bombay for clinical instruction; the Society would be likewise glad to see that matriculated female students alone be instructed in the higher standard, as the contrary would tend to defeat the very object for which they are trained." The motion was seconded by Mr. Cowasjee Hormusjee, who further urged in favour of sending the students to different hospitals the incapability of one hospital to instruct the very large number of students who now attended the College. Mr. Atmaram supported Dr. Blanc in his views. Mr. Succaram was of opinion that as the society had not heard the other side of the questions, it would be well to wait before it passed any resolution, and hear from Dr. Carter, who was a member of the society, his views on the disputed points, for he was mainly concerned in the disposal of the two questions. He believed that the present arrangement was a provisional measure till they got matriculated female students. Several members were of opinion that it was wrong to saddle the profession with incompetent persons who would never be able to reflect credit on it. The secretary pointed out that in the circular convening the meeting it was intimated that these subjects would be discussed at this meeting, and if Dr. Carter was not present to express his views, it was not their fault. The proposition was then put to the vote, when all except Mr. Succaram and Mr. Mody voted in its favour.—Bombay Gazette.

The preparations for the forthcoming exhibition at Calcutta are going on apace. Owing to the large demands which have been made for space, it has been found that the accommodation provided by the Museum and the annexes built contiguous to it is utterly inadequate. It has therefore been decided to provide extra space for British and Colonial and Continental exhibits near to Chowringhee. The Indian section and the machinery annexes will occupy the maiden. The jewels of the Native Princes and Rajahs, for the safe custody of which some twenty of Milner's safes have been ordered from England, will, according to present arrangements, be exhibited in the new Economic Museum. The buildings on the maiden, which are being rapidly pushed forward under the supervision of Mr. Mills, C.E., of the Public Works Department, will be connected with the museum and the annexes by means of a bridge. Hydraulic lifts and other machinery requiring water power will be placed near a large tank, which is conveniently situated in the immediate neighbourhood. The machinery in motion will occupy a shed covering an area of some 20,000 square yards. A large ornamental building covering an area of 10,000 square feet has been ordered out from England, and no fear, it is stated, need be felt as to the "great building" being completed in time for the opening of the exhibition. We are informed by Mr. Walpole, the Secretary, that arrangements are being made by the Municipality, the Commissioner of Police, and M. Joubert to provide ample accommodation for visitors.—Bombay Gazette.

INDIAN TRAMWAYS.—A concession has been granted by the Municipality of Karachi for the execution of a system of such lines of transport in their town. These lines are to be worked by mechanical power, and will in fact form a railway communication between the terminus of the Scind Punjab, and Delhi line, and the shipping port, with branches to the principal merchant godowns, so that independently of its ordinary passenger traffic as a tramway, the line will form a much needed means of transport for the large export and import trade of the harbour, which promises to be vastly superior to the present slow and expensive carriage by bullock gharris. When we consider that the growing trade of this port has now reached the large figure of nearly 700,000 tons per annum, employing upwards of 600 of these primitive vehicles, we think that the time has come when they should be superseded by more efficient modern appliances; and that the proposed scheme, when carried out, will find a large and remunerative traffic ready to its hand. We note also that this project is only the beginning of wider operations to be taken in hand by the company; which, under the title of the Tramways Company of India, proposes to extend the construction of such lines to other localities which have long experienced the need of such improved means of communication.—Englishman.

LORD RIPON'S FORTUNATE ACCIDENTS.

WE are glad to learn, on the authority of Professor Max Müller himself, that it was only "by a mere accident" that his name was added to the published list of "Anglo-Indians who have communicated their names to the British India Committee as supporters of Lord Ripon's policy." But surely such an "accident" as this—so signally beneficial to the cause of which Mr. Foggo and his friends are the champions—demands some little explanation, beyond the mere statement that it was an accident. When the total array of Lord Ripon's "supporters" among Anglo-Indians amounts to forty-one names, as advertised by Mr. Foggo in the Times, it is obvious that each name is important, as constituting in itself a considerable fraction of Lord Ripon's total support; and now that Professor Müller has voluntarily come forward in the Times to disclaim the title of Anglo-Indian, the public has a right to know how the "accident" came about, that his name was erroneously included in the list of such a remarkably small and select coterie. There are other names, too, in that list, in regard to whom a reasonable suspicion exists that there has been a similar "accident." We know not whether Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Sir Charles Hobhouse, Professor Rhys Davids, and some other of Mr. Foggo's Paladins, have resided in India in some capacity, in which their fame has not been equal to their merits; but if not, their inclusion in Mr. Foggo's little band seems to demand explanation. What makes the matter worse is that Professor Rhys Davids is described as "late of the Ceylon Civil Service." Now, in the class to which Mr. Foggo and his friends appeal, Ceylon will generally be held to be sufficiently near India to give a Ceylon civilian a certain amount of authority on Indian subjects; and even among the majority of the well-educated Englishmen, it is not generally known that the circumstances of Ceylon—which are precisely those of the Indian Presidency towns, with a large and highly-concentrated European population, rich and powerful, and well able to take care of itself in every way—are exactly such as to be most certain to mislead those who judge of India from a knowledge of Ceylon. We do not wish to imitate the example of Mr. Bright in his speech at Willis's Rooms; nor do we think, with that famous orator, that abuse of opponents is any substitute for argument. But it would be absurd to conceal the fact, that there is a strong and bitter feeling abroad, among those who are to be the victims of Lord Ripon's policy, that the number of "accidents," against which they have to contend in their endeavours to get a fair hearing from the British public, has been most remarkable, and perhaps unprecedented in English political history. At the very outset, there was the "accident" of the famous "cooked telegram" that misled the Standard, and that was accepted and published as an ordinary "Reuter" by the Sheffield Daily Telegraph, and probably by the whole of the English Provincial Press. It has subsequently been explained that it was only an "accident" that the word "official" slipped out in course of transmission—"slipped out" was, we think, the very phrase used in the explanation. But an enormous political advantage was gained by the fact that this "accidental" telegram, concocted and paid for by Lord Ripon's Government, gave to the British public the first detailed information about the Ilbert Bill, under the imprimatur of the universally trusted and impartial Reuter; nor could any amount of subsequent explanation deprive Lord Ripon of the advantage thus gained. Moreover, excellent official reasons have been subsequently given—in Indian papers—why sundry mistakes of fact (all, oddly enough, tending to strengthen Lord Ripon's case) were made in this pseudo-Reuter by Lord Ripon's Government. We are told that it was only proper that the arguments on Lord Ripon's side should have been given at great length, whilst those on the other side were omitted altogether in most cases, and in others condensed into a line or two; and we are also assured that, when the official additional members of the Council spoke in favour of the Bill, it was quite right to describe them in the Reuter as "independent members." But whatever may be the value of these official explanations, the fact remains that, in all probability, not one person in ten thousand of all those people in England who received their first impression of the Ilbert Bill from the account of the debate supposed to have been compiled by Baron Reuter's agent, and published as a Reuter in every newspaper in England, will ever even hear of the interesting "accident" that this particular Reuter was really compiled by the Government of India, revised and corrected by Major Baring, and that only the Viceroy himself and a small inner circle were privy to the fact of its transmission as a Reuter.

Then, again, there was the "accident" of the astounding slanders and mis-statements of Mr. Bright's speech at the meeting in Willis's Rooms—open, palpable mis-statements, that could not for a moment be defended as true, in the presence of the facts—and yet sent forth to the world as uttered, uncontradicted, in the presence of several Anglo-Indians of high position and character, who knew them to be false as well as we know them to be so! And consider, for a moment, the political effects of this "accident." Tens of thousands will read the speech of the great demagogue, merely because it was spoken by Mr. Bright, who will never trouble themselves to read a line of the replies of Anglo-Indians; and that speech was, without doubt, reported and commented on in every newspaper in the land. Take, first, Mr. Bright's slanderous imputation of base motives to the Anglo-Indian opponents of the Bill, and consider its effect on public opinion in England. We doubt whether a single Radical, or even a single Liberal, paper in the country has thought it necessary to call attention to Mr. Markby's disclaimer, that was hidden away in a back-page of the Pall Mall Gazette; and not a single one of Mr. Bright's allies had the courage or the honesty to get up there and then, when the foul libels were uttered, and denounce them as false and malicious. And what is the consequence? They have been repeated and enlarged upon in every Radical paper and in every Radical club in the land! This is what the London Echo said of Mr. Bright's meeting the very next day:—

"The official class want to subordinate Indian to English interests, and in carrying out their plans they want to keep their foot on the necks of the teeming millions of India. On the other hand, the promoters of the meeting desire to see India developed from within and become strong."

And the Northern Echo, a feeble and ungrammatical northern reflex of its London namesake, calls the opposition to the Ilbert Bill a "licentious compact of military dictators," and compares their memorial to some flagitious document of which it says:—

"Some of our readers may remember that we analysed the signatures to that document, and showed that they was (sic) strong in two elements which would render any political protest weak."

Take, next, Mr. Bright's misstatement of the actual scope of the Bill itself—again uncontradicted by the experts present. We find even the London Spectator, in its summary of Mr. Bright's speech, describing the Bill as one "permitting a few Native Judges, who are members of the Covenanted Civil Service—i.e., who have been educated here and gone back to India under the same conditions as our own Indian Civil Servants—to try Europeans accused of crimes." We reproduce in another column a very striking letter to the Spectator from "An Englishwoman," which ably exposes this "accident;" and the editor of the Spectator, in a note appended to the letter, frankly confesses, "On referring to the paragraph we see that the sentence, intended only to condense Mr. Bright's account of the Bill, appeared to come from ourselves, and we regret the blunder." Everywhere the same story meets us; "we regret the blunder" is ever the cry of Mr. Bright's allies as soon as the "blunder" is exposed, but in the meantime the political effect of all these "accidents" and "blunders" is in no way impaired by subsequent "explanations" in obscure corners or back pages.

So, again, of Lord Kimberley's most extraordinary misunderstanding of the obvious meaning of Sir Alexander Arbuthnot's reference to the numerous recent outrages on European ladies in Calcutta and elsewhere. Lord Kimberley, in his reply to the Anglo-Indian deputation, used words that fixed on that reference the most monstrous, as well as the most offensive meaning; and as we proved by quotation from the Press Association's telegram at the time, Lord Kimberley's words on the point were sent round to the provincial press, whilst Sir A. Arbuthnot's words (which could not by any possibility be distorted into a form that would bear the meaning assigned to them) were not sent round at all!

So, too, of Mr. Forster's mis-statement of the relative precedence, in point of time, of the Ilbert Bill and Local Self-Government controversies—a mis-statement of considerable importance, as justifying the imputation of such ulterior motives to the opponents of the Ilbert Bill as might render them hateful to advanced English Liberals. But it is unnecessary to multiply instances of these unfortunate "accidents." As we have already said, we do not wish to follow Mr. Bright's example in imputing base motives to those whose opinions differ from our own, and we do not desire to imply that we believe these "accidents" in all, or even in many, cases wilful or malicious ones. But what we do most honestly believe of them is this, that they are usually the result of the eager haste of fanaticism, that has neither the patience to test the accuracy of its facts, nor the scrupulous sense of justice that would induce it to examine critically its methods of attack. That they have reasonably caused much bitterness in the minds of those whose cause has been so seriously injured by them cannot be doubted; and if this miserable Bill should pass in some form or other—as there now seems every reason to fear is likely to be the case—the remembrance of the means by which its triumph has been secured will not tend to mitigate its disastrous effects.

LORD RIPON'S THREATENED SPOILIATION OF BENGAL.

WE are glad to observe that Lord Lytton and Mr. Stanhope have presented, to the Lords and the Commons respectively, the petitions of the landowners of Bengal, Behar, and Orissa against the iniquitous Bengal Tenancy Bill; and we earnestly hope that the friends of justice in this country will come forward, before it is too late, vigorously to protest against an act of shameless spoliation that must destroy the peace, and rudely check the progress, of the most peaceful and most progressive province of India. That such an Act would be an impossibility, under a Conservative Government goes without saying. But we venture to declare that if the actual facts of the case were well understood in this country, Liberals would cry shame upon it as well as Conservatives; and already some prominent Liberals who have taken the trouble to inform themselves of the true merits of the question—we would especially instance that unflinching enemy of injustice, Lord Stanley of Alderley—have come forward to protest against the monstrous unfairness of this ill-advised measure. For it has not even the poor excuse alleged for the confiscatory operation of the Irish Land Act, that it robs the landlords in order to enrich the tenants; for under the peculiar circumstances of Bengal, a very large share of the plunder of the landlords will find its way into the coffers of the Government, and we shall have raised up a war of classes in Bengal merely to enable the Government to "walk round" the Permanent Settlement, whilst we create a new and lower class of drones to live on the labour of the actual cultivators.

We propose to lay before those of our English readers who are unacquainted with the history of the question, a plain statement of the facts of the case in a series of short articles unencumbered by technical details. If the question were merely one of landlord versus tenant, we should not be sanguine of being able to obtain a fair hearing for the landlord's side, however monstrous the nature of the injustice proposed to be inflicted on him. But we trust we shall arouse an interest in the question in the minds of even the most advanced Radicals if we can show that the Bill has been allowed to degenerate into a dishonest and tortuous device for enabling the British Government to break its solemn pledges, and to lay its hands on the much-coveted wealth that has been created by its loyal adhesion, in earlier and more scrupulous times, to the pledges of the Permanent Settlement. For in stripping the landlords of Bengal of a part of their property, and making that part over to certain tenants, who will at once form a new class of limited proprietors, Lord Ripon is astutely removing a considerable portion of the property in land in Bengal from the operation of the Permanent Settlement, and rendering it (by the very nature of the tenure) peculiarly liable to the exactions of the tax-gatherer. If the Permanent Settlement is to be abrogated at all—that splendid fiscal system which has turned the jungles of Bengal into one vast and teeming rice-plain, whilst it has enriched the Government by providing it with stable and prosperous tax-payers—it would be far better that it should be attached in front. But we look on the Bengal Tenancy Bill as a shabby attempt to attain, by a side-wind, and with an enormous indirect loss, those covetous desires which have so often been inspired by the contemplation of the wealth that has been created and guarded by the Permanent Settlement.

IS THE OPPOSITION TO THE ILBERT BILL A SLUR ON NATIVE MAGISTRATES?

WE have often, in these columns, dwelt on the undoubted fact that nearly all those Anglo-Indians who have been well known as champions of Native privileges, are found among those who strongly oppose the Ilbert Bill. We have asked our Bengali friends seriously to reflect on this question:—Which is likely to be the side most truly friendly to real Native interests, the side of Sir George Campbell, and Mr. Bright, and the "Perish India" School; or the side of Mr. Rivers Thompson, and Sir Richard Garth, and Mr. Tottenham, and Mr. Beveridge, and Colonel Malleon, and scores of other Anglo-Indians whose names are household words in Bengal? And we have also shown that this likelihood, or reasonable presumption, in favour of the opponents of the Ilbert Bill, is fully borne out by the merits of the points in dispute. We have shown that the supporters of the Bill have thrown down an apple of discord between the Native and European communities, which is absolutely certain, if not speedily withdrawn, to produce ever-increasing hatred between them—a result which must certainly be as deplorable for the loyal Native community as for their European fellow-subjects; and we have always insisted, in spite of Mr. Bright's slanders, that the dread of this deplorable result has been one of the most potent factors in arousing such determined and persistent hostility to the Bill among the most liberal-minded Anglo-Indians. That the opposition to the Bill involves a slur on Native Magistrates has been indignantly denied and disproved in the memorial to the Secretary of State from the Anglo-Indian Association (London Committee), as well as in the Indian Memorial, in the letter of the High Court Judges, and in every other manifesto put forth by the opponents of the Bill. But we think the point has been nowhere so clearly and strikingly demonstrated as it is in the letter addressed to the Times yesterday by that venerated ex-Chief Justice, Sir Laurence Peel, which we reproduce in full, in our correspondence columns.

We heartily commend these words of truth and wisdom to the consideration of our Bengali friends, in the sincere hope that they will tend to mitigate that bitterness which has been the not unnatural result of the slanders so sedulously put about by the supporters of the Bill. As we have observed more than once, the Native gentlemen of Bengal would be more than human if they could help being stirred up and irritated, when Lord Ripon and Mr. Bright and their allies assure them, with all the artifices familiar to inflammatory rhetoric, that the opposition to the Bill is inspired partly by the meanest motives of self-interest, and partly by the wanton desire to insult and outrage Native self-respect. But there are not wanting signs, we are exceedingly glad to observe, that the intellect of India has not been altogether debauched by these mischievous appeals to ignorance and passion. It is perhaps too much to expect that any patriotic Native journal should, as yet, have the courage boldly to bid the tempter avaunt. But the passages we are able to quote occasionally from the Hindoo Patriot and the Journal of the Anjuman-i-Punjab are sufficient to show that the qualified support accorded to the Bill by the better classes of educated Indians is of the fair and honourable type represented by Mr. Markby's letter to the Pall Mall Gazette, rather than of the venomous type represented by Mr. Bright's speech. We trust that the legitimate influence exercised by these and other high-class journals, and by the higher social strata which they represent, will ere long be able to permeate those lower levels of Indian Society which have been seduced by Radical rhetoric. Considering the relative positions, as teacher and pupil, of English and Indian civilisation, it is sad to reflect how great are the political dangers, how fatal the political errors, which may be introduced into India along with the many substantial advantages of Western political life. Of all such dangers and errors, none can be more disastrous to the future progress and happiness of the country than that principle of class-hatred and class-jealousy, that spirit of envy, hatred, and all uncharitableness, which in England lies hid under the name of Radicalism. A determined attempt is being made by Lord Ripon's Government to acclimatise this evil principle in India. By the Bengal Tenancy Bill they teach the Ryots that the Zemindars are their oppressors and their natural enemies. By the Local Self-Government schemes they teach the Native community to distrust the guidance of their old tried and trusted friends, the District officers. But the Ilbert Bill is by far the most ingenious, as well as the most dangerous, of all these insidious attempts; for by wounding the European community to the quick, first of all, Lord Ripon forces that community to cry out—and then he turns to the Native community and says, "See how these fellows hate you; they are crying out merely because I wished to do you a kindness!"

THE KOLA NUT.

In view of the wide-spread and rapidly increasing feeling in favour of Temperance, the Management of "Supply and Demand" have great pride in announcing that they are on the eve of introducing into Europe the KOLA NUT of Africa, the great and beneficent qualities of which are here somewhat tersely set forth.

The Family Herald says:—"A Temperance Nut."—The virtues of the Kola Nut as a rival to the celebrated Coca of South America, in the possession of the property of enabling persons partaking in it

TO ENDURE PROLONGED FAST AND FATIGUE.

Are pretty well-known, but this peculiarity does not by any means exhaust the list of the wonderful properties possessed by this West African product.

Dr. Attfield states that it has been found to contain the same active principle as Coffee—viz., caffeine—only in greater proportion than the best Coffee, while it also contains the same active principle as Cocoa, but less fatty matter. He therefore thinks that, with proper treatment, it might be able to compete successfully with those beverages, for the Nuts are used to form

A REFRESHING AND INVIGORATING DRINK

throughout a large portion of tropical Africa, their use being said to

"SUPPORT THE STRENGTH, ALLAY INORDINATE APPETITE, ASSUAGE THIRST, PROMOTE DIGESTION AND TO RENDER THOSE USING THEM CAPABLE OF PROLONGED FATIGUE."

Dr. Daniell says of them:—"It would be difficult to find any product which constitutes such an important article as the KOLA NUT," and it appears that the negroes use the for on eating a single nut, ground up and made into a cream or paste, with water or spirit, all sign of intoxication is removed in half an hour.

Mr. Papeño says that the KOLA NUT will go even further than this, and that

ALCOHOLIC DRINKS WILL NOT PRODUCE ANY INTOXICATING EFFECTS AT ALL,

if the KOLA NUT is eaten at the same time. Other evidence takes us a step further still, for it is alleged that the craving for drink, which is such a strong incentive to drunkenness, may be subdued by the use of this valuable Stimulant and Tonic, as after chewing KOLA NUT, great disinclination is felt to all forms of alcohol.

Beyond this:—1. It is the best appetiser extant. 2. It cures indigestion. 3. Relieves low spiritedness and otherwise has a beneficial effect upon the Liver.

That it will do all, and more than is claimed for it, is proved beyond a doubt.

The Management have already secured numerous testimonials from eminent medical men, noblemen, clergymen, &c.

Will be sold in boxes (the Powder) and in bottles (the Extract) at 2s. 6d., 4s. 6d., and 7s.

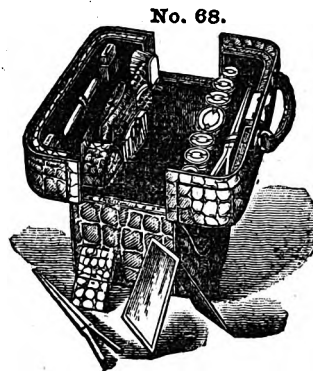

Directions for use accompany each parcel. Ask your Chemist for it, or send direct to the only Proprietors in Europe,

THE MANAGERS OF "SUPPLY & DEMAND," 15, OLDFORD STREET, BOND STREET, W.

NOTE.—The Managers beg the assistance of all the influential classes in spreading this wonderful Nut, the effects of which must lead to good and real results.

THE VOICE OF INDIA. A NEW MAGAZINE INTENDED TO GIVE EX- PRESSION TO THE PUBLIC OPINION OF INDIA.

THERE are in England large classes willing and anxious to do justice to India, but they find it very difficult to know how to act. They complain that Indian questions are intricate; that the opinions of official experts are contradictory; and that the people of India are dumb, and do not give expression to their needs. This defect it is now desired to remedy, by publishing monthly in Bombay a magazine somewhat similar in nature to Public Opinion in England, which will provide a compendium of all that is most valuable in the native journals throughout India on the leading topics of the day. It is hoped that the Voice of India will thus give forth a clear sound, interpreting between the rulers and the ruled, and making known the true wishes and feelings of the Indian people.

The Magazine will advocate no views of its own. It will seek only to reflect with care and accuracy the views set forth in the native press. The Indian people are naturally docile and conservative; and it is believed that the writings thus brought before the English public will be found to be characterised by a knowledge of facts, and generally by practical good sense and moderation. No doubt grievances will from time to time be set forth; but it is a policy of prudence no less than of justice to give these grievances a fair constitutional hearing. Accordingly, it is hoped that this publication will be welcomed by all Members of Parliament desirous of dealing with Indian questions, and that the facts thus brought together in a convenient form will be of value to journalists and other public writers. It is specially desired to bring the Magazine before the public in clubs, reading-rooms, libraries, and institutes throughout England, with a view to promote a sustained and intelligent interest in the welfare of our Indian Empire, comprising as it does 220 millions of our fellow-subjects.

This Union is formed to maintain the ancient marriage law of the land, and in particular to resist the legalising marriage with a wife's sister.

Its efforts are directed to organising Committees throughout the United Kingdom, to diffusing information by lectures, publications, and otherwise on a subject on which public opinion has been much misled, to encouraging Petitions to both Houses of Parliament, and to directing the attention of the Legislature to the true bearings of the question. A Ladies' Committee has been formed to assist the Union.

The whole principal of which the Marriage Law of this land is based is involved in the acceptance or rejection of the Deceased Wife's Sister Bill. In all countries where the Marriage Law has been relaxed in this one particular, other relaxations have, after some lapse of time, been adopted; in some countries not only may a woman marry her sister's husband, and a man marry his brother's wife, and his wife's niece, or, as in the State of New York, his wife's daughter, but in others a man is freely permitted to marry his niece by blood.

As the operations of the Union are very extensive, Subscriptions and Donations are earnestly requested. All Cheques and Post Office Orders to be crossed either Herries, Farquhar, and Co., or Glyn, Mills, and Co.

It will be obvious that the publications circulated by this Union, although the arguments and considerations contained in them, point to the same conclusion, represent in particulars only the mind of their respective authors.

OPINIONS OF ENGLISH PROVINCIAL PRESS ON THE ILBERT BILL, AND

THE PETITION OF THE BENGAL AND BEHAR LANDHOLDERS AGAINST LORD RIPON'S REVOLUTIONARY LAND BILL.

TUESDAY, AUGUST 14, 1883.

OPINIONS OF THE ENGLISH PROVINCIAL PRESS ON THE ILBERT BILL.

["BRISTOL TIMES AND MIRROR," AUG. 8.]

NOBODY knows—excepting those who have near relatives in India—the fearful anxiety which is felt by all classes of society in our Eastern Empire at the present political position. India is regarded apparently as an appendage of the British Crown. People look upon it as an inevitable portion of our possessions. It is nothing of the kind. It was won by the sword, and it can only be kept by the sword's point; and—thanks to Lord Ripon—the weapon may have to be used earlier than those who do not look ahead have the slightest notion of. The inhabitants of India, like those of Ireland, are a conquered race, the former being ruled more by fear than the latter. Still, as in Ireland, we allow them a latitude so far as the press is concerned; and, as in the "Emerald Isle," they make the best, or rather the worst, possible use of the opportunity afforded them. In Ireland, however, we can always keep the populace pleasant in a certain sort of way, but in India we have to maintain our position at all hazards, and consequently, when we read the native press, we can appreciate to the fullest extent the utter mistake of the Ilbert Bill. The following flattering estimate of the relative endowments, mental and physical, of Englishmen and Bengalees appeared in a late number of the Amrita Bazar Patrika, under the title, "What is it that the English boast of?"—It is a fair specimen of the sentiments of the vernacular press. "The English fear to say anything to any other Indian race. They are afraid of the Mohammedans; they only show their anger to the Bengalees. In knowledge and skill they have been defeated by the Bengalees; and in argument they cannot compete with the natives of Bengal. Having been defeated in learning, in skill and in debate, they boast themselves in their physical powers. But be the Bengalees ever so weak and so timid, they are not a bit weaker or more timid than any Englishman residing in India. It is not a very long time ago since Mr. George, the principal of the Krishnagur College, got up a cricket match between the Krishnagur College and the Hooghly College, in which the former were victorious. In those days the barracks at Hooghly were occupied by British soldiers, who challenged the Krishnagur Eleven, and with what result—why a few Bengalee school boys beat the English soldiers at their national game of cricket." After this we almost feel inclined to play Mr. Freeman's farce of "Perish India," and many, we fear, will undoubtedly perish in India before we succeed in establishing again upon a sound basis our sovereignty over the dependency which Lord Ripon has so grossly misruled.

["SHEFFIELD DAILY TELEGRAPH," AUG. 3.]

THE effect of Mr. Ilbert's Bill on the natives of India has been very like that of Mr. Gladstone's "policy of conciliation" on the natives of Ireland. The Irish have received a gift of 25 per cent. of their rents out of the pockets of the landlords, and now they wait in eager expectancy for the other 75. The natives of India have been taught by Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Ilbert, Mr. Bright, and other "patriots," that it is not merely their right but their duty to rebel, and they learn their lesson only too well. Since the agitation over the Ilbert Bill began a new paper, Indian Opinion, has been started. It is full of scurrilous abuse of everything English. In a leading article it is urged that Mr. Ilbert's Bill "has served to awaken a national life in us." The position of the natives is compared to that of the Plebeians at Rome, and we are told "under such circumstances our combination to gain this small amount of power is expected to be crowned with success. Notwithstanding this, the opposition does not come from our rulers, but from non-officials and Feringhees. This kind of combination is unprecedented in the annals of Bengal, and therefore it is to be praised the more." If it be true, as Pope has it, that "Praise undeserved is censure in disguise," the censure which the Government of India has lately been enduring by the praise of every Indian print most hostile to England is very heavy indeed. If we now see running rampant a combination against English rule "unprecedented in the annals of Bengal," we know only too well that for this consummation we have to thank Lord Ripon and Mr. Ilbert.

["SHEFFIELD DAILY TELEGRAPH," AUG. 9.]

THE House of Commons, under the leadership of Mr. Gladstone, is counted out when a matter most intimately affecting the interests of every Anglo-Indian and of every Englishman is on the tapis. This fact justifies only too well the structures passed from time to time by Mr. Fawcett (before he got into office,) and by other men who have interested themselves in the affairs of India, as to the national apathy about our greatest concerns. In the meantime, the excitement of India over the Ilbert Bill shows no sign of abatement. The Indian papers last received are almost literally full of this subject. The richness of the matter for comment and quotation is positively embarrassing; for the present we confine ourselves to one important official document, the minute made by Mr. F. J. Lincoln, District Judge of Lucknow, on the Criminal Jurisdiction Bill. This gentleman—a man of great experience living in a district where, as all men know, he has had special opportunities of becoming acquainted with the real opinions of the people—is decidedly against the Ilbert-Ripon proposal. He quite coincides with the view we have taken of the laudatory tone of the native Press, and holds that "praise undeserved is censure in disguise." He says "the criticism of the native press upon a given proposition is no gauge of the sentiments of the mass of the people." There is "no political life in the masses in India," and there is frequently neither moral nor intellectual sympathy between the different classes into which native communities are split. The members of the educated classes in India have "in a measure become estranged from their fellow-countrymen, and even from the members of their own family." On the contrary, the opinion of Englishmen in India differs from that of Englishmen at home—where it differs at all—as the opinions of "experts" may differ from those who have only a surface acquaintance with what they are talking about. It is urged with "damnable iteration" that only a very slight change is contemplated by the Ilbert Bill. But the result of the change would prove simply enormous, and as Mr. Lincoln says, "the material interests of the people cannot be measured by the mere idiosyncrasies of a class of men who can only view them from a standpoint of their own." On the point of prestige this thoroughly competent judge speaks in language equally decided. He tells us that the interests of the Indian native and of the European are really one—a fact vouched for by the unprecedented prosperity of India under English rule. But the Europeans are in such a minority that they must be supported by prestige and by power in bringing their ideas home to the native population. The effect of such equality as the Ilbert Bill proposes would be immensely prejudicial. Mr. Lincoln says of the Englishman under such changed circumstances: "His influence and his privileges gone, he could no longer exercise the authority over the mass necessary for his own preservation, whilst that ascendancy which he all along enjoyed, and which always constituted the test of superior nationality, would no longer be recognised; insidious and sinister influences, derogatory to the position and status of the European, would make their way, and penetrate even the masses in the absence of any restraining power. No European, whatever his position may be in India, would escape the effect of these insidious influences when once he was deprived of his true position; the official would fare no better than the non-official. It would be as if a great revolution had swept over the social and political position of the European in India." The force of these remarks must be at once felt by anyone who recalls the fact that a few thousand Englishmen rule the 250,000,000 of the native Indian population. For the present we can only conclude with the remark with which we began—that, though the chief blame undoubtedly rests with the Government, it is little creditable to either party that the House of Commons should have been counted out the other evening when members specially conversant with the subject were prepared to enlighten the public as to the merits—or rather the scandalous demerits—of the Ilbert-Ripon Bill.

IT is a well-known and acknowledged principle of English justice that a man should be tried by his peers. By the measure now before the Indian Council this principle is thrown to the winds, for it is proposed that our fellow subjects in India shall for criminal offences be put upon their trial before native judges. And this in remote districts where there is no public press, and therefore no public opinion, to exert their influence on the side of an impartial administration of the law. The cry has been raised that Englishmen in India are jealous of the natives being placed on an equality with themselves; but as a matter of fact no such feeling exists. On the contrary, at the present time in the Presidency districts criminal and civil cases are heard before native judges, and there is no desire that this state of things should be altered. But here there is no fear of a miscarriage of justice happening, for the native judges are associated with English colleagues, and there is ever present the Bar, the Press, and public opinion watching over their judicial utterances and doings. Mr. Ilbert's Bill proposes that native judges shall exercise jurisdiction in criminal matters in out-of-the-way districts where prejudices against Englishmen are well known to exist, and where it would be the easiest thing in the world to trump up false charges against Englishmen and Englishwomen, too, and where in nine cases out of ten, if tried before native judges, they would be sure to succeed, and the unfortunate victims be consigned to all the horrors of an Indian gaol. That this is no fancy picture is proved by a speech made by Sir Stewart Bayley in the Indian Council on the bill, in which he asserted from a personal knowledge of the district in which the proposed change in the law would operate, that the real danger lay in the isolated European being liable to have false cases trumped up against him—a danger which he averred "was a very real and very serious one," and the more so because of the unscrupulous methods which are had recourse to when bringing cases before the court. It must not be forgotten, too, in connection with this important testimony of Sir Stewart Bayley, that the Criminal Code of India differs from our own in that offences against morality are punishable by imprisonment. No great stretch of imagination is needed, therefore, to realise the danger that our own countrymen and countrywomen would constantly run from being brought before these native Judges charged with all sorts of horrible offences, and that prejudice against the British race would more often than truth and justice influence the natives, whom the British Government propose to make Judges over Englishmen.

In view of such a state of things coming to pass, it is certainly little less than criminal for a Government to have thrown down such an apple of discord in the midst of our great Indian Empire at a time when it was their plain duty to have done all they could to unite all races. For it is a remarkable fact that this concession to native prejudices was not asked for by the people of India. Unsolicited, therefore, Lord Ripon has proposed this radical change in the legal administration of India, and has stirred up strife and contention which will not easily be laid. It is satisfactory to know, however, that the proposed change in the law has been condemned by every Indian official, whose advice and opinion have been invited on the subject. That is to say, the servants of the Queen, who are responsible for the good government of India, and who are well acquainted practically with the manner in which the proposed change in the law would affect Englishmen, have pronounced against it. This being so there is only left the miserable sentiment of the question—the so-called equality of the races. But India no more than Great Britain can be governed by sentiment, and the sooner that truth is realised by Lord Ripon the better for our great Empire in the East. Lord Ripon in his kindness of heart has evidently made an egregious blunder. But now that it has been unmasked it should no longer be persevered in. Lord Ripon has seen his error in the policy which in the beginning he thought it right and proper to pursue towards the Ameer of Afghanistan. The recent grant of a handsome subsidy to the Ameer is proof positive that Lord Ripon has seen reason to repent of many things he once said as to what should and should not be our policy in Afghanistan. If he has retreated in that direction, he can as easily retreat in another. Let him withdraw this most obnoxious and dangerous Ilbert Bill without delay. The public opinion of India is against it. And the public of England, now that it is being enlightened on the true merits of the controversy is pronouncing against it likewise. Peace and goodwill should reign in India between Englishmen and natives, but the Government are certainly dead to the responsibilities of their position in promoting this good fellowship if they gratuitously and uninvited, as in the case of the Ilbert Bill, stir up strife and ill-feeling which must take years to allay.

The great meeting held at Limehouse Town-hall on Thursday night was a fitting answer to the meeting held on the previous day at Willis's Rooms. Unlike the gathering presided over by Mr. Bright, it was to all intents and purposes a public meeting. There was no attempt to pack the assembly, and the inevitable opposition of the Radicals only brought into more prominent relief the unanimity and enthusiasm which existed amongst the great majority of the meeting. Mr. Stanhope's speech was a statesmanlike contribution to the Ilbert Bill controversy, which will do much both at home and abroad to enlighten public opinion on the real issues of the case. The position held by Mr. Stanhope in the late Conservative Administration as Under Secretary for India will give additional weight to Mr. Stanhope's remarks, which were listened to with an attention and interest which their importance deserved. Of Sir A. Arbuthnot's address we can only say that it deserved the attention bestowed upon it by the thickly packed audience. He demonstrated from a long and varied experience in India the injudiciousness of the proposed change in the law, and the result that must accrue in stirring up animosities and ill-feeling between Englishmen and natives in India. He also demolished

Mr. Forster's argument of the previous day that the opposition to Mr. Ilbert's Bill had arisen in consequence of the introduction of the Local Government scheme, for he showed that the latter measure was introduced some months before the Ilbert Bill was heard of at all. The hardships and injustice of the proposed change of the law were very powerfully depicted by Mr. Roper Lethbridge, who also spoke with a full knowledge of Indian affairs. The perils that Englishmen and Englishwomen will be liable to in the out-of-the-way districts he depicted with an eloquence and reality which "brought down the house," and to the question he put whether the men of East London would care to submit their wives and daughters to such dangers there was an emphatic "No" from the meeting. And this was duly emphasised when the resolutions condemning the Bill and urging its withdrawal were put up to the meeting, for they were carried by large majorities. This, therefore, is the answer of East to West London, and it is one which, if we mistake not, will be repeated during the next few weeks in other parts of London.

["GLASGOW NEWS," AUG. 6.]

AMONG the many protests which have been made against the Bill to subject Europeans in India to the criminal jurisdiction of native Magistrates, none is so emphatic or so deserving of careful consideration as the urgent remonstrance of the Englishwomen in India. This protest has been embodied in a petition to Her Majesty the Queen, craving her protection against a proposal which would be of incalculable danger. The petition has been signed by 5,758 Englishwomen in India, and is being circulated throughout this country, annexed to an appeal to the British people to join in its request. We have frequently drawn attention to the legal and national defects in the Ilbert Bill, but probably no ground of opposition will be so generally considered unimpeachable as that taken by these petitioners. The male section of the British community in India constitutes a force in great measure able to take care of itself, but the social status of women in India is so abhorrently different from their position in this country that, in order either to protect Englishwomen in their just rights or to maintain a Christian example which can be followed, every endeavour must be made to avoid anomalous appearances. The Englishwomen who reside in India have, it may be asserted, accompanied husbands, brothers, or fathers as a matter of sacred duty. By so doing they have sacrificed the social privileges of Britain in favour of domestic ties. It must be remembered that the Ilbert Bill applies chiefly to the residents in the interior, where coffee-planters, tea-growers, and other settlers live in isolation. The Englishwomen in the Presidency towns are surrounded with every advantage which pertains to a British city. It is, therefore, the secluded residents on plantations, distant from centres of civilisation, who alone are affected, and whose peculiarly unguarded position is by the Ilbert Bill made more dangerous than hitherto it has been. These Englishwomen are surrounded by a community of natives whose character is undoubtedly excellent in many respects, but is blotted by what we consider socially degrading customs. They are all avowed polygamists, both as a matter of religious belief and as a traditional habit of the race. Their treatment of women differs from that in this country by all that constitutes an advanced stage in the progress of humanity. The position of the female sex in the social system of India must remain altogether different till a perfect revolution is made in their most vital conceptions of religion and humanity. The application of the present Bill would be demoralising in its treatment of Englishwomen, as ranking them not with the highest class of native women, but with the lowest and casteless. If the Englishwoman is to be treated with the consideration which we hold to be her natural right, the very reverse must be the case.

The natives of India who constitute the most educated class belong to a caste whose social customs and traditions forbid a woman to be seen in public. A native Magistrate would consider the appearance of his wife in court a degradation which nothing could atone. None but the lowest caste would be subjected to this publicity. The British Government has lent its sanction to this feeling, and by law exempts native women of respectability from appearing openly in court, either as witnesses or charged with offence. The greatest consideration has ever been given to this matter, and even in cases of the gravest importance care has been taken not to offend native susceptibilities. The very fact that a native woman appeared in court would suffice—and justifiably so—to create a prejudice against her which would tend to facilitate conviction. To this low condition the Ilbert Bill desires to degrade Englishwomen. It enables a native Magistrate to summon before him and try Englishwomen in a manner in which he would treat none but the most abject of his own race. It is little wonder that the vehement appeal and urgent petition of the Englishwomen have rung throughout the Empire. Even the native agitators in favour of the Bill view this side of the subject with something approaching to hesitancy and wonder. If the British rulers of India, they say, are willing to place the women of their race in a more humiliating state than respectable Hindoo women, what about their boasted advance in civilisation? Even those who have no shadow of sympathy with abstract Hindoo theories would hesitate to exhibit so practical a contravention of traditional instincts. The knowledge that Englishwomen are subject to this contravention of native custom would engender comparisons most prejudicial to the esteem in which they should be held. Yet even the agitators in favour of the Bill know that our countrywomen in India deserve to be placed in the most exalted position for other reasons. One of the most powerful is, that from Englishwomen alone can we expect that influence for good on which the enlightenment and amelioration of native women so largely depend. The native gentleman who may have been in England returns to his traditional treatment of the females of his race when he arrives again in India. The women are uneducated, and accustomed to consider themselves a low order of being. No missionary can invade their sanctum—it is by the efforts of Englishwomen alone that they can be got at and taught the necessary truths. No native would admit to intercourse with his female relatives a woman who, in law and in custom, was recognised as an inferior in caste. Thus, one of the greatest efforts for good in the elevation of the native race is stultified by an obnoxious and unnecessary enactment.

A leading Radical organ, commenting on this petition, flippantly asserts that the Englishwomen who have signed it must belong to a class which is frequently brought into contact with the magistracy. The petition has been signed by Englishwomen who are above suspicion, but who are more practically acquainted with the mendacious tendencies of many of the natives of India than are the majority of Radical theorists. False charges, supported by a superabundance of witnesses, are only of too frequent occurrence in India; and it is clear that the knowledge of the injury and dread would operate as a powerful incentive to any ill-disposed native to resort to trumped-up charges against an Englishwoman for the purposes of extortion, intimidation, and revenge. To any wife or daughter aware of the fact that advantage may be taken of the temporary absence of a husband or father to drag her before a native court, the sense of danger and horror must be painfully great. Above all is the principle of trial by one's peers, and by one's own race. As has been pointed out, the position held by women in native society is so entirely different from that held by European women, and this difference so materially affects all the relations of social and domestic life, and the customs, habits, and feelings connected with those relations, that no native of India, however highly educated, can possess the knowledge or sympathy essential to a correct appreciation of the feelings and conduct of Englishwomen. Such a correct appreciation of the feelings and conduct of accused persons can alone qualify a judge to try them, and consequently the effect of the change in the law proposed by the Ilbert Bill would be to transfer the trial of European women in India to men who by force of circumstances are incompetent to do them justice. Further than this is the personal honour which men of this country recognise as woman's greatest right. Owing to the low estimate in which the natives of India hold the female sex it would be imposing a special indignity on Englishwomen and would inflict a cruel wound on their self-respect, were they to be subjected to trial by native Magistrates. It is hoped that the appeal of the petitioners will be considered by the public as more worthy of consideration than the advanced radical sensationalism which gave birth to the Bill.

["BELFAST NEWS LETTER," AUG. 2.]

A MEETING was held in London yesterday in support of the policy pursued by Lord Ripon in India. The principal speaker was Mr. John Bright, and his oration afforded another melancholy proof of enfeebled intellect and intensified intolerance. There is hardly any conceivable subject upon which Mr. Bright could discourse without besmirching it with party rancour. His periodical surveys and glorifications of his own political career are quite naturally taken advantage of for the display of his arrogance and contempt for all who differ from him on public affairs, excluding, of course, all humane and beneficent Factory Act legislation, of which he was a bitter opponent, and the contempt entertained for bloated sinecurists, of which he is the most conspicuous example of modern times. In dealing with the question of Lord Ripon's policy it was, therefore, quite natural that Mr. Bright should travel outside his subject, and endeavour to make a little political capital out of it on behalf of his party. He referred to the diversity of opinion which prevailed in India with reference to the notorious Ilbert Bill, and more than hinted that the opposition was purely selfish in its origin, and fanned into life by jealousy and class hatreds. If there is one thing more clear than another in relation to this dangerous measure it is this: that the adverse opinion of Anglo-Indians is almost unanimous; that so radical a departure from the decentralising policy of Lords Lawrence and Mayo is pregnant with incalculable evils; and that to spring it upon the country at a time when the Local Government scheme was creating such a wide and deeply-felt sentiment of antagonism was an intolerable and almost incurable blunder. Mr. Bright should not have forgotten that Lord Ripon himself recognised the serious nature of the opposition created by the Bill, and in order to obtain the individual opinions of all the commissioners, collectors, and other influential Anglo-Indians, he issued instructions for them to send in their views not later than the 15th of July. This has been done, and there should be no difficulty in these opinions being laid before Parliament before the close of the Session. There are well-grounded fears, however, that this desire will not be carried out, for the good and sufficient (Liberal) reason that they are perfectly unanimous in opposition to the scheme. Writing on this subject a fortnight ago the Calcutta correspondent of the Times declared that Bengal and Assam, the two provinces chiefly affected by the measure, have strongly urged its withdrawal. Mr. Elliott, Chief Commissioner of Assam, "admits that he was mistaken when last year he expressed an opinion that Europeans would not object to the proposed legislation." He now finds that nothing will reconcile them to it, and adds "that, inasmuch as they represent the whole of the wealth and the intelligence of Assam, the work of the Government will be brought to a standstill if their goodwill be alienated by the passing of the Bill in any form." Mr. Bright makes light of the proposed change, because it will only affect a certain percentage of the Anglo-Indians. But he forgets that it is precisely in the isolated places where the greatest danger is to be feared, and where class feeling runs highest. If Lord Ripon and his colleagues chose to disregard the unanimous opinion of the officials to whom they appealed, including all the Anglo-Indian Judges of the High Court of Calcutta, their conduct cannot be otherwise interpreted than a wanton insult, and the feeling of irritation will be dangerously intensified. The opinion of these Judges was published in the Times of yesterday, and a very remarkable document it is. Every point, says our contemporary, which has engaged attention, whether in India or England, is dealt with. Their conclusions are—That the production of the Bill was unnecessary and was called for by no circumstance of Indian administration; that the measure exposes the European settlers to inconveniences and dangers not to be ignored; above all, that it presents no elements of finality, and that, though described as of small present import, it may even by its actual terms lead to the largest changes in the administration of the criminal law, is pointed out in the clearest manner by the court. Mr. Bright denied that the action of Lord Ripon with reference to questions of Local Self-Government and Criminal Jurisdiction was calculated to set class against class, a very remarkable proof of ignorance on the part of a public man who is supposed to have made Indian affairs a special study. Whatever views may be entertained about the wisdom of Lord Ripon's policy, there should be no mistake about the dangerous class antagonisms it has fomented. This is crushingly exemplified in the tone and temper of the native Press, the "freeing" of which the right hon. gentleman boasts of as another of the beneficent acts of the present Government. The native Press of India, says an able writer in the current number of the Quarterly Review, "is in a special degree the weapon of the political organisations which are secretly sapping the foundations of British rule. . . . Half of the papers are sold at a loss, and as their daily farrago consists of unqualified abuse of Englishmen it is not difficult to appreciate the object of their existence. With a few exceptions, the whole Native Press is libellous, and since the editors of three-fourths of the papers are Brahmans, it is idle to consider their utterances as expressive of public opinion." For Mr. Bright to congratulate the Government on "freeing" this Press, and to find it, at the present moment, lauding Lord Ripon to the skies, are two of the most lamentable and dangerous features of this burning controversy. It displays on the one hand an ignorant and infatuated predilection for the indiscriminate application of Radical nostrums so characteristic of the great demagogue; and on the other an ominous sign of the times in the vast and inflammable Empire of India, which ought to make even Lord Ripon pause and consider his position and the consequences of his policy.

["BRADFORD DAILY CHRONICLE," AUG. 2.]

THE meeting held yesterday in Willis's Rooms in support of Lord Ripon's Indian policy, especially in so far as it relates to the Ilbert Criminal Jurisdiction Bill, was a gathering of a kind with which we are becoming pretty familiar. The names which are usually found in the reports of proceedings of this kind are to be found in the report of yesterday's meeting—those of a handful of strong-minded women, with their devoted admirers, half a dozen Radical M.P.'s from the Extreme Right, a dozen or so of those "old Indians" who imagine that they have solved every political problem on earth in the seclusion of their remote stations, and, to fill up the room, a host of persons for whose opinion on a question of ordinary politics no one would care a straw. It will no doubt be claimed that yesterday's meeting was large and influential, and that it accurately interpreted the public feeling with regard to this new departure in Indian policy. Mr. Bright, that far-seeing statesman, who, after holding up his pious hands for years in horror of a policy which in any way implied coercion, turned round and supported the most stringent measure of coercion that has been passed in modern times, was "specially engaged." He has long posed as the champion of oppressed peoples, and the word freedom is supposed to be deeply engraven in his political heart; so it was only fitting that the member of the Liberal Party who suggested the Irish Land Act should come forward to talk about Indian affairs—of which he knows nothing. His oratory was of the usual florid type. He expressed the opinion of course, that "if the Bill did not become law the hope of the people would be blasted, and instead of hope their souls would be filled with despair. With a growing knowledge on the part of the people of India there would be a growing discontent, and with a growing discontent a growing disloyalty with all its attendant perils." If the Government of to-day had not been in a somewhat grievous strait it would not have been worth while to raise the old humanitarian cry, and to represent Mr. Gladstone's Administration once more as challenging the verdict of the civilised world upon a policy of superfine morality and exalted humanity. It is rather singular that on a day destined to be distinguished by a Radical meeting of this type, the report of the Indian judges on this miraculous Bill should be given to the world; and it is not less remarkable that with one exception those judges condemn the proposals in the most uncompromising manner. The exception, as might have been expected, is the Hon. Mr. Justice Mitter, a Bengalee Baboo, who has been elevated to the Bench by Lord Ripon, for some occult reason, as his antecedents rather disqualified than advanced his claims to the position. The opinion of the judges is emphasised and supported by the European newspapers published in India, which have arrived by this mail. They say generally that feelings of disgust and well-nigh despair have been excited by Lord Ripon's policy in the minds of all thoughtful Indian officials. A gentleman holding high office in the Civil Service, and a Liberal, says:—"I am personally, and always have been, in favour of encouraging the growth of local self-government, but I believe in slow and quiet progress, and I abhor the big sounding phrases with which the present Government have trumpeted forth their ideas, and their policy of attempting revolutionary changes by great leaps. They will, if they have not already done so, evoke a spirit they cannot lay or satisfy except by the withdrawal entirely of the British power." To Radical doctrinaires of the "Perish India" School this prospect would not be at all alarming; but to anyone who has studied Indian politics even cursorily it is evident that the British power must be maintained by force, and that the revolution proposed by the Ilbert Bill might, and probably would, have a very dangerous tendency. The views of the deputation which recently waited on the Earl of Kimberley express pretty fairly the bases of the opposition to the measure. They regard the Bill with the greatest apprehension and concern, and consider that it is not justified by any necessity, either political or administrative. The existing law, in their opinion, admirably fulfils all the requirements of justice, with the least possible administrative inconvenience, and to the entire satisfaction of those whose interests are affected by it. The Bill proposes to extend, under certain conditions, criminal jurisdiction over European British subjects to four classes of Native magistrates—(1)

Native covenanted civilians selected by competition in England; (2) Native civilians appointed in India under 33 Vic., c. 3; (3) and (4) Native assistant commissioners in non-regulation provinces, and Native cantonment magistrates. On the other hand, disenabling operation will be very wide indeed. The Government will be deprived by it of the services in future appointments to the office of justice of the peace of the whole European uncovenanted and non-official communities throughout the land. The all but unanimous judgement of Anglo-Indian officials is that the native magistrates proposed to be appointed are ill-suited to deal in a satisfactory manner with criminal charges against Europeans; and what makes the argument against the Bill all the stronger is that it will hardly be likely to injure the wealthier and more influential Europeans whom the natives, at all events for the present, will be afraid to conspire against. The merchant, the lawyer, the planter may escape; but the Bill will smite with terrible effect the unprotected planter's assistant and the skilled mechanic, who are the bone and sinew of England's enterprise in India. The measure will be prejudicial to the best interests of the natives of India, and dangerous to the safety of Her Majesty's Indian Dominion, for it is certain that if persisted in it will keep alive in future those mischievous race antipathies which its introduction has revived, and will thereby add seriously to the difficulties, already sufficiently great, of Indian administration. All the windy eloquence of the friends of India who met yesterday to revel in each other's oratory cannot explain away the fact that the introduction of a Bill which proposes to hand over the trial of Europeans to Natives, saturated with caste and religious prejudice, is one more gigantic blunder to be added to the long list which every act of this Government seems destined to make longer.

PETITION OF THE BENGAL AND BEHAR LANDHOLDERS AGAINST LORD RIPON'S REVOLU- TIONARY LAND BILL.

TO THE HON'BLE THE COMMONS OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND IN PARLIAMENT ASSEMBLED.

The Petition of the undersigned Members of the Central Committee of Landholders of Bengal and Behar, meeting in Calcutta, on behalf of themselves and of their fellow-landholders in the Bengal Provinces in British India,

HUMBLY SHEWETH,—

That your Petitioners are filled with great anxiety, apprehension, and alarm at the introduction into the Council of His Excellency the Viceroy and Governor-General for making Laws and Regulations of a Bill entitled the Bengal Tenancy Bill, the manifest tendency of which seems to be to revolutionise the present relations between landlord and tenant in the provinces of Bengal and Behar, to redistribute landed property on a new and inequitable basis, and to fetter the freedom or action of all classes interested in agriculture by driving them at almost every step of their mutual transactions to Courts of Law and fiscal officers, and to foster dispute, litigation, and animosities in lieu of peace, harmony, and goodwill among them.

2. That your Petitioners do not wish to trouble Your Hon'ble House with the history of that solemn covenant of the State, entitled the Permanent Settlement, which the late Honorable East India Company, with the sanction of the Imperial Parliament and the Crown, concluded with the zemindars as "actual proprietors of the soil," under which the Government transferred its rights in the land to the said proprietors in consideration of revenue assessed at ten-elevenths of the gross rental and fixed in perpetuity, nor with an account of the advantages—financial, economic, social, material, and political—which both the State and the people have derived from the operation of that Settlement for the last ninety years.

3. That, in consequence of the exorbitant assessment of the revenue under the Permanent Settlement, no vestiges of most of the old zemindars with whom the covenant was made now exist; the land has been divided and sub-divided and purchased at the full market value by capitalists as a legitimate investment of capital in thorough good faith and in perfect reliance upon the guarantees of rights and interests given by the Permanent Settlement Regulations.

4. That, until 1859, those guarantees had always been maintained inviolate, but in that year a law (Act X of 1859) was passed conferring new rights upon tenants under arbitrary and fanciful rules of prescription, and seriously clogging the rights of the landlord with regard to tenancy and settlement of rent, and imposing grave difficulties in the way of recovery of rent.

5. That although Act X of 1859 is a direct infringement of the Permanent Settlement Regulations, still it has been in operation for nearly a quarter of a century, and rights have grown up under it, which cannot now be fairly or equitably abrogated. Under it a large majority of the tenants have acquired rights of occupancy or fixity of tenure; rack-renting, which had hardly ever prevailed, has been altogether prevented, and even free sale of occupancy holdings has been recognised in some parts of the country with the consent of the landlord. So far Act X of 1859 has fulfilled its great object in improving the position of the tenant and securing his rights; but the landlord has not only lost some of his ancient and guaranteed rights, but has also been deprived of the ordinary facility of settling and realising the rent due to him, though he is burdened with the obligation of paying in the Government Revenue by the sunset of the quarter-day, the expiration of which renders his estate liable to peremptory sale for default.

6. That in addition to the payment of the Government revenue, the landlords or zemindars are required under serious penalty to collect from tenants for the Government the Road and the Public Works Cesses without any remuneration, and to make good all losses that arise from failures in collection on account of default due to bad seasons and other causes not attributable to them; and that in consideration of this service they were promised by three successive Lieutenant Governors of Bengal, Sir George Campbell, Sir Richard Temple, and Sir Ashley Eden, a simplified procedure for the recovery of rent. Some Bills had been introduced into the Bengal Legislative Council towards that end; but they were abandoned with a view to a general revision of the Rent-Law.

7. That a Commission, consisting chiefly of Government officers, was subsequently appointed to report on the general revision of the Rent-Law; but that Commission, without taking any evidence, or examining the parties interested as to the necessity of the amendment of the law, its direction, extent, and scope, submitted an elaborate but extremely one-sided scheme, upon which is primarily based the present Bill. Some provisions of a highly objectionable character have also been introduced into the Bill, which had not been recommended even by the Rent Commission.

8. That one unfortunate incident has practically barred constitutional redress in respect to this Bill as far as the Legislature of this country is concerned. Your petitioners gratefully acknowledge that the fullest opportunity had been given to the public to discuss the original draft of the Bill at its initiatory stage before the Bengal Government, but neither when material alterations and additions were made to it by the Bengal Government, nor when it was finally laid before the Government of India, the public were allowed any such opportunity; on the contrary, they were positively refused access to it; and the sanction of the Right Hon'ble the Secretary of State for India was taken without giving the public or the parties interested the slightest opportunity of knowing or discussing its contents. Under the Indian Constitution H.M.'s Secretary of State is the highest controlling authority, and all laws passed by the Indian Legislature are liable to be revised and disallowed by him; but when his permission for a public measure is obtained beforehand, without previous public discussion, practically the public judgment is anticipated and barred. The leading principles of the present Bill having been already sanctioned by H.M.'s Secretary of State, its formal passage through the Indian Legislative Council will necessarily be a formality; and as the Government has a standing majority in that Council, the aggrieved can hardly hope for a fair hearing in matters which are already matters of foregone conclusion.

9. That the Bill under notice is so voluminous and so comprehensive that it would be tedious to approach Your Hon'ble House with a detailed criticism on it. Your Petitioners would, therefore, crave permission to draw attention to the following summary of the leading principles of the Bill, to the innovations which it proposes to introduce, and to its general policy and tendency:—

1. The Bill proposes to effect a redistribution of land by making an allotment of it in a manner which neither past history nor present facts justify. It declares that all lands, except such as are in the private possession of the landlord in respect of which he may prove twelve years' continuous occupation, shall be regarded, from the date of the introduction of the Bill, as the specific property or portion of the tenant class for habitation and cultivation, along with various incidental rights; that at the discretion of Government the lands may be surveyed and demarcated at the expense of both landlord and tenant; that conflicting claims to such lands shall be the subject of a summary investigation; and that the landlord, even in the case of relinquishment of a tenancy, or of its purchase by him, if he wishes to let it, shall be bound to re-let it to a new tenant at the old rate and conditions, including permanent occupancy right. This is wholly an innovation, and makes a serious encroachment upon the proprietary rights of the landlord. It is in direct antagonism with past history, for when the Permanent Settlement was concluded, it was the land which sought the tenant, and not the tenant who sought the land; and this was particularly the case in the distribution of waste lands, which had been made over to the landlords or zemindars by way of compensation for the ruinous assessment of the settlement, and the proprietary right from the reclaimed portion of which is now being taken away from them. The land had thus no such characteristic attached to it as now proposed, and the landlord was in no way fettered in the mode of the settlement of his estate. The proposed provision will not only deprive the landlord of his inherent right of re-entering upon land which a tenant may relinquish or which may lapse on the expiration of a lease, but will also give rise to serious dispute, misunderstanding, and litigation between landlord and tenant in the establishment of their claims to different classes of land.

II. At the time of the Permanent Settlement the resident hereditary tenant had fixity of tenure; custom had recognised that right, but no period had been fixed for the accrual of the right; by Act X of 1859, twelve years' continuous possession was declared to be the basis of occupancy right; and this provision was allowed retrospective effect; accordingly, a squatter by mere efflux of twelve years' time, acquired a right of occupancy, to the detriment of the rights of the actual proprietors of the soil guaranteed by the Permanent Settlement. This is the interpretation of that law by some of the highest Judicial authorities—notably Sir Barnes Peacock, late Chief Justice of the Bengal High Court, and now a member of H.M.'s Privy Council, and Sir Richard Garth, the present Chief Justice of Bengal; but this innovation has been the law of the land for nearly a quarter of a century, and although it involves gross injustice to your petitioners and the class they represent, they would submit to it as they have hitherto done. By far the largest number of tenants in Bengal have acquired a right of occupancy, and they do not wish to take it away. They, however, submit that it would be the height of injustice if the right of occupancy be further extended in the manner proposed in this Bill. It is now declared that any tenant, if he holds any land in any village or estate for twelve years consecutively, though the land so held by him at different times may have been different, shall be deemed to have become a settled tenant of that village or estate, and to have acquired the right of occupancy, though the last plot, in which the right will accrue, may have been held for a year or even for a day, and may exceed ten times the quantity previously held by him. The right of occupancy is also extended to tenants of the private domains of the landlord, unless there be a lease for a fixed period. Even as regards tenants-at-will, the provisions are so fenced with restrictions by providing compensation for disturbance that they will virtually become tenants with permanent occupancy right. The extension of the occupancy or tenant right in this arbitrary manner, without any compensation to the landlord, will be a serious encroachment upon his proprietary rights, and will be a deliberate infringement of the guarantees under which he has invested his capital in land. Indeed, it will have practically the effect of redistributing property in land on a new basis.

III. The tenant-right in Bengal, wherever it has existed, has always been heritable, but not transferable. Even Act X of 1859 did not make it transferable. But it has become transferable in some parts of the country with the mutual consent of the landlord and tenant. The growth of this custom, if desirable, may fairly be left to the natural operation of economic laws. But to force it by a legislative enactment would be alike detrimental to the proprietary rights of the landlord and to the material well-being of the tenant. The landlord will then cease to be lord of the soil, which he has inherited or purchased by paying market value for it; he will lose his inherent and just right of choosing his own tenant; although directly liable to the State for revenue under the stern sunset law, by losing his hold upon his tenantry under this process of transfer of tenant-right without his consent, he will be driven to despair in the collection of his rent, and consequently to ruin. On the other hand the tenant, by acquiring the new freedom of sale, will from excessive Government taxation, adverse seasons, thriftlessness and other causes, find a facility which will inevitably encompass his ruin, as has been the case in some of the temporarily settled districts of the country where the transferability of the tenant-right is recognised, and where special laws have become necessary for the relief of the distressed agriculturists. Small capitalists, mostly money-lenders, will take the place of the present agriculturists, who will be reduced to mere day-labourers on their expropriated lands.

IV. With a view to counteract the evils to the landlord referred to above, the Bill gives him the right of pre-emption in case of the sale of a tenancy, but under such restrictions as to render it nugatory. In the first place, if the landlord wishes to buy it in, he must pay the full market value for it; that is to say, he must pay a fine, as it were, for exercising his proprietary right, and if he cannot agree with the tenant as to the price, he must go to court. Even if he purchases it, he will not be allowed the same rights that will be accorded to an ordinary purchaser. After purchasing it if he chooses to let it again, he must re-let it at the old rent to a new comer, who will ipso facto acquire the right of occupancy. An ordinary purchaser will not be bound to accord that right to his sub-tenant. So that a capitalist, who purchases an estate with a certain calculation of return, will get no quid pro quo for the sums he will have to lay out again for the purchase of tenancies, simply because the tenant is invested with a new right of transferability of his holding, without of course paying any consideration for it. Supposing that tenants in any large numbers choose to sell their holdings, and that other tenants choose to combine and withhold payment of rent, in order to compel the landlord to their own terms, a contingency by no means uninfrequent, ruin will stare him in the face, and if he has not means, he must submit to his fate, however unmerited, through an act of the Legislature, the paramount duty of which is to give equal protection to all classes of H. M.'s subjects.

V. The determination of rent in Bengal has been generally discretionary. It is true that there was at one time a customary rate in many parts of the country, but the custom was varied so much by personal, local, and other considerations, that the rate was practically left to the discretion and mutual understanding of the landlord and tenant. This fact has been brought to prominence by the recent inquiries made by Government as to tables of rates prevalent in different districts. When the Permanent Settlement was made in 1793, the rate of rent, it is on record, varied from three-fourths to one-half the value of the gross produce of the land. Until a few years of the enactment of Act X of 1859, there was not much dispute between landlord and tenant about the rate of rent; the rise in the value of agricultural produce led to a demand for increased rent, and in order to bring the question of rent to a satisfactory judicial test, that Act declared that the rent shall be reasonable, fair, and equitable, and provided certain rules for the guidance of the courts. These rules, however, have proved so unworkable that the enhancement of rent through the judicial machinery has practically come to a dead-lock. The gravity of the situation was represented by the landlords to Government, and the Government promised to redress their grievance. That promise is now about to be redeemed by the retrograde step indicated in this Bill. Under this Bill the rent of an occupancy tenant shall not exceed 20 per cent. of the gross value of staple products of the land. In other words, the landlord is practically reduced to one-fifth partner of his own property with his tenant. The rent due to him represents the shares of the Government and of himself, but this arbitrary limit will necessarily deprive him of all participation in the advantages which the progress of the country will confer upon all other classes of the community, but will always be subject to losses consequent on decadence and reverses. As regards the tenant-at-will, called in the Bill "ordinary ryot," the restrictions are so fenced round that practically there will be no enhancement of rent. In Behar, there are certain tenures called Bhoali tenures, analogous to Metayer tenures, and with regard to these the Bill actually sanctions reduction of the present rents. Thus the landlord will be practically deprived of the legitimate fruits of his capital, prudence, and good management, the enjoyment of which had been guaranteed to him by the Permanent Settlement.

VI. Contract is the basis of transactions in civilised life, the first step in advance over patriarchal habits, and essential to the success of social and moral progress. The tenant, as an agriculturist or as a member of society, is allowed perfect freedom of contract in all matters affecting him, whatever the difference in the status, intelligence and influence of the contracting parties; but this Bill declares that he shall not be competent to enter into a contract respecting his tenant-right or the rent payable by him, unless his contract for the latter is approved by a Revenue Officer to be appointed by Government. This denial of the ordinary rights of a citizen to the tenant was never before known in this country. On the contrary, the Legislature had repeatedly encouraged the interchange of lease between landlord and tenant. The disability imposed upon the landlord for the sake of the fancied security of the tenant is still more arbitrary, unjust, and unjustifiable.

VII. The importation of foreign ideas in the regulation of the ordinary relations of life in an Oriental country, for which the people are not ripe, can only lead to harm. Never in the history of this country, or at present within the British territories or in the Native States, is the practice of paying compensation to a tenant-at-will for relinquishment of his holding known or recognised. As a rule, the class of tenants called tenant-at-will have not the means of making improvements, and therefore there has never been any question of compensation for disturbance raised. This innovation will not only be a serious interference with the proprietary rights of the landlord, but will plunge both landlord and tenant into deep litigation.

VIII. This Bill will foster litigation between the landlord and tenant at every step of their transactions. The landlord's office will be transferred to the Revenue Office, and the landlord himself will be reduced to a mere annuitant. Whether the question be classification of land, determination of occupancy right, transferability of a tenancy, the exercise of the right of pre-emption on the part of the landlord, the settlement of rent, the payment of compensation to a tenant-at-will for disturbance, or the realisation of rent, there will be at every step expensive, harassing, and, not unfrequently, demoralising litigation. There will be no peace, no concord, no harmony, no good-will between two such important members of the community as the landlord and tenant. Such embittered relations between them, as will be the inevitable result of the proposed Bill, cannot be conducive to the true well-being of the State or society.

IX. As regards recovery of rent, the landlord had formerly power to call in the tenant to pay in his rent, failing which he could have him arrested by a simple application to the Court, followed by a summary inquiry. He could attach the property of the tenant and sell it after due notice. All suits for arrears of rent were heard before all others by the Civil Courts, and were finally transferred to the Collector for expedition. Act X of 1859 took away from the landlord all power of calling in his tenant. At first the arrear suit was triable by a Revenue Officer under a summary procedure, but now it has been made a regular civil suit, to be tried at a heavy cost under the regular civil procedure. That result is that ordinarily a rent suit is not disposed of within three months, and not unoften many months, and that if the tenants continue to withhold rent, the landlord must either succumb, or let his estate be sold for default. It is observable that this procedure is not applicable to the State in the recovery of its dues as landlord or as guardian of minor landlords. If the State with its vast resources, unequalled influence, and immense prestige, without the terrors of a Sunset Law for sale of estate in case of default or revenue, deems it necessary to have recourse to a summary law for the realisation of rent, how much more necessary is it for the private landlord for a like purpose? Although three successive Lieutenant-Governors of Bengal, as stated above, had promised the landlords the simplification of the procedure for the recovery of rent, still no advance has been made in this Bill in that direction.

X. On the contrary, the Bill practically minimises the only facility, which the present law provides for the speedy realisation of rent, viz. distress. The process of distress is now made at every step a process of court, and by the time the court's order may be obtained, the crops may be removed or disposed of, and the landlord's demands thus defeated. As the Bill has been framed, the landlord will, on the one hand, be made to forfeit his ancient, substantial, and valuable rights, but will, on the other, derive no benefit from it.

XI. Nor will the bona-fide cultivator derive material benefit from the Bill. If he holds land under a superior landlord, his rent will be 20 per cent. of the gross produce of the land, but under a subordinate holder it will be 30 per cent. of the same, or 50 per cent. more than what he will pay to the former. He will acquire occupancy right under a superior landlord, but none under a subordinate holder, the latter being himself a tenant with occupancy right. So that without fixity of tenure, freedom of sale or security of fair rent, the actual cultivator of the soil under the operation of this Bill will be reduced to the miserable lot of a poor day-labourer.

XII. And this evil will be both multiplied and aggravated, as the Bill proposes to encourage sub-letting. If there is anything in the agricultural system of Bengal, which has tended to depress the condition of the actual cultivator of the soil, it is sub-infeudation. The actual agriculturist, who constitutes the lowest link of the chain, necessarily bears the whole burden, and the more the chain will be lengthened, the worse will be the fate of the actual cultivator of the soil. The new tenure-holders, who are created by the Bill, will be small proprietors, and it may be easily imagined whether small proprietors, themselves not agriculturists but absorbing agricultural profits, are more conducive to the welfare of the agricultural population than large proprietors. By-and-by, as the capital of these small tenure-holders will increase, they will also become large proprietors. The result of the proposed Bill will, therefore, be the destruction of the present proprietors who have either inherited or paid fair market value for their estates, the creation of a new class of small proprietors, who will, for the most part, acquire their rights without paying for them, and the impoverishment and degradation of the actual cultivators of the soil.

Such, in brief, are the manifest tendencies of the proposed Bill, opposed to all principles of equity and fairness, to the guaranteed rights of the landlord, and to the best interests of the actual cultivators of the soil.

10. That no valid proof has been induced showing the necessity for this wholesale, revolutionary, and confiscatory legislation. The Rent Commission, which originally drafted the Bill, as already stated, did not take any evidence on the subject. No less an authority than Sir Richard Garth, the eminent Chief Justice of Bengal, says—"The Bill is calculated to deprive the landlords unjustly and unnecessarily, in my opinion, of rights which the courts of law have always considered to be their due." Indeed, the whole Bill, whether as originally framed by the Rent Commission, or subsequently revised by the Government of India, has been based on arbitrary assumptions and gross predilections. Your Petitioners respectfully appeal to Your Hon'ble House to consider whether rights and interests, worth millions upon millions of pounds, and consecrated by solemn Acts of the State, and ratified by the sanction of nearly a century, should be sacrificed for sentimental and fanciful considerations.

11. That, on the other hand, there is abundant testimony to show that the tenantry of both Bengal and Behar have made rapid strides in progress and prosperity unhampered by the existing land laws. The latest and most emphatic testimony is that of Sir Ashley Eden, the late Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal. Thus, in 1877, after making a tour in the interior, he made the following remarks on the condition of the agricultural population of Bengal:—

"Great as was the progress which I knew had been made in the position of the cultivating classes, I was quite unprepared to find them occupying a position so different from that which I remember them to occupy when I first came to the country. They were then poor and oppressed, with little incentive to increase the productive powers of the soil. I find them now as prosperous, as independent, and as comfortable as the peasantry, I believe, of any country in the world; well fed, well clothed, free to enjoy the full benefit of their labour, and able to hold their own or obtain prompt redress for any wrong."

As regards the peasantry of Behar, the same high functionary, in an address to a deputation of the Behar landholders in 1881, said:—

"I can assure you that nothing has given me greater pleasure than to notice, as I have had ample opportunities of doing, the extraordinary improvement in the condition of the people. It is made manifest in a hundred ways daily, even to the most casual observer. I hear the same story from all classes, official and non-official, and it is a matter for general congratulation."

"This improvement is due to various causes; first and foremost, to several succeeding harvests, plentiful almost beyond the recollection of the present generation, and these full harvests followed years of trial and famine; next there has been, with growing prosperity, an increase in the value of land, a general awakening of the cultivating classes, and an improved knowledge of their legal rights and privileges, and this has, I hope, been accompanied by a strict administration of the law. Then there has been a greater readiness on the part of landlords to recognise and affirm the rights of cultivators, and I hope that this may to some extent be due to the influence of your Association."

Surely, in the face of this strong and authoritative testimony, it cannot justly be contended that the agricultural prosperity in Bengal and Behar is impeded or hampered by the existing land laws.

12. That the proposed Bill is ill-suited to the purposes for which it is intended is evident from the fact that the Bill is not made applicable to the State in regard to property which it holds in the capacity of a landlord. The State has a separate and summary law for the settlement and recovery of rent on its own estates. Even when it manages in trust the private estates of minors or wards under its care, it is not subject to the ordinary procedure for the realisation of rent. If an inquiry be made, it will be found that the tenants of the State landlord are by no means better off in life than those of the private landlord; perhaps in many instances worse off. It is but reasonable that, ceteris paribus, the same land-law ought to apply equally to the State landlord and the private landlord, for surely what is done by the State ought to be regarded as the best example for the private landlord.

That, in conclusion, your Petitioners pray that Your Hon'ble House will be pleased to take the above statements, facts, and reasons into consideration, and to adopt such steps as to Your Hon'ble House may seem meet to prevent the passing of the Bill under notice.

And Your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

HOME NEWS.

COUNCIL DRAFTS ON INDIA.—Tenders for Rs. 2,50,000 in bills and telegraphic transfers on India were received on Wednesday at the Bank of England. The amounts allotted were as follow:—In bills on Bombay, Rs. 7,50,000, at an average rate of 1s. 7 3/4d.; in telegraphic transfers on Calcutta, Rs. 16,50,000, and Bombay Rs. 7,50,000, at an average rate of 1s. 7 4/37d.—making a total allotment of Rs. 31,50,000. Tenders for bills at 1s. 7 3/4 received in full, and for telegraphic transfers at 1s. 7 1/16d. 75 per cent. Later in the day one lakh of transfers on Bombay was sold at 1s. 7 1/15-32d. Up to the previous night, since the beginning of the financial year, the Council had sold remittances for Rs. 6,97,21,350, realising £5,640,257.

GRANT IN AID OF THE AFGHAN WAR.—On Wednesday an estimate for £500,000 was issued as the amount required in the year ending March 31, 1884, as an instalment of a grant in aid of the expenditure incurred by the Government of India upon the war in Afghanistan in the years 1878-1880. In a note attached it is stated that the Imperial grant in aid of this expenditure will amount, in all, to £5,000,000, of which part has been met by the remission, by 44 and 45 Vic., cap. 54, of the debt of £2,000,000, incurred by the Government of India in 1879, under 42 and 43 Vic., cap. 45, and the remainder will consist of six annual payments of £500,000 each, the fourth of which is provided for in the present estimate.

THE ELECTRIC LIGHT ON BOARD SHIP.—On Wednesday evening at Portsmouth the Indian troopship Malabar was successfully lighted throughout with Edison's incandescent light with which all the Indian troopers are to be fitted. The ship from stem to stern, from stokehole to yardarm, is lighted with 379 lamps, being 114 sixteen-candles and 286 eight-candles. There are sixty-six on the saloon deck, twelve of which are police lamps, which will burn continuously, and there are others similar in different parts of the vessel. Every lamp is fitted with a fusible plug of lead wire, which will become fused directly the current exceeds the safe limit, and so the light will be immediately cut off without the others being affected. The light is divided into fourteen circuits, at each end of the yardarms are reflectors which will have eight lamps of thirty-two candles. There is only time to complete one more of the Indian troopships before the trooping season commences.

OBITUARY.—Colonel William Scott Drever, C.S.I., of the Madras Staff Corps, whose death is announced as having occurred recently at Madras, in the 52nd year of his age, entered the Indian Army in 1847, and obtained a Lieutenancy in 1850. He was formerly in the 31st Madras Native Infantry, and in 1856-7 was employed in suppressing the insurrection in the Pariah-Kimedy district. In 1859 he was engaged in North Canara, in the suppression of an armed insurrection in that district, and on several occasions distinguished himself in personal encounters with the rebels, who were all eventually captured or slain. He obtained a Captaincy in 1861, was promoted to the rank of Major in 1867, became Lieutenant Colonel in 1873, and Brevet Colonel in 1878. He had been for some time Commissioner of Police for the town of Madras, and was nominated a Companion of the Order of the Star of India in recognition of his Indian services.

INDIAN RELIEFS, 1883-84.

THE following programme of the Indian reliefs to be carried out between Portsmouth and Bombay during the season of 1883-84 has been promulgated from the Horse Guards. The dates are calculated for the whole of the voyages being performed via the Cape outward and homeward, but at present the decision on that point relates only to the first four voyages. If, therefore, before the intended date of commencement of the fifth voyage it should be found that the ships can proceed through the Suez Canal, the programme will be revised:—

The Malabar will leave with drafts only on September 4, arriving at Bombay on October 21. She will return to Portsmouth on December 18 with time-expired men and invalids.

The Euphrates will leave on the 8th of September, with the A Battery 1st Brigade Royal Artillery, for Dinapore, Bengal, the D Battery for Secunderabad, Madras, and the F Battery for Kirkee, Bombay, and Artillery drafts, arriving on the 26th of October. She will return to Portsmouth on the 24th of December with the 2nd Battalion North Lancashire Regiment and time-expired men.

The Jumna will leave on the 12th of September, with the 1st Battalion Royal Irish Fusiliers, and drafts for Rawal Pindi, Bengal, arriving on the 1st of November. She returns to Portsmouth on the 31st of December with time-expired men and invalids.

The Serapis will leave on the 16th (calling at Queenstown), with the E Battery 1st Brigade for Kirkee, Bombay, No. 2 Battery Scottish Division for Murree Hills, Bengal, and No. 3 Battery Scottish Division for Fort William, Bengal, arriving on the 7th of November. She returns to Portsmouth on the 4th of January with the H and L Batteries 1st Brigade and time-expired men and invalids.

The Malabar will leave for the second time on the 30th of December with drafts, arriving on the 15th of February. She returns to Portsmouth on the 12th of April.

The Euphrates will leave on the 3rd of January with drafts, returning to Portsmouth on the 16th of April.

The Jumna will leave on the 11th of January with the 2nd Battalion Royal Dublin Fusiliers for Gibraltar and drafts for India. On disembarking the Fusiliers, she will convey the 1st Battalion North Lancashire Regiment from Gibraltar to Ahmednagar, Bombay. She returns to Portsmouth on the 25th of April.

The Serapis will leave on the 16th of January with the 2nd Battalion South Lancashire Regiment for Malta, and drafts for India. On disembarking the troops at Malta, she will convey the 2nd Battalion Royal Munster Fusiliers to Kamptee, Madras. She returns on the 29th of April.

The troops returning home next year are not distributed to the ships, so that no dates can be fixed for their arrival in England. They include the 10th Hussars, the M and N Batteries 1st Brigade Royal Artillery, Nos. 7 and 8 Batteries 1st Brigade Southern Division (at Aden), the 2nd Battalion Royal Irish Fusiliers, and the 1st Battalion York and Lancaster Regiment (at Aden). The 7th Dragoon Guards will proceed to Mhow, Bombay, about January, and the following go from India to Aden:—No. 7 Battery 1st Brigade London Division, No. 8 Battery 1st Brigade Eastern Division, and the 1st Battalion Essex Regiment.

The Government of India has decided that Golaghat is the most suitable location for the Assam Transport Depot, it being more healthy than Gauhati and nearer probable scenes of operations.

INDIA IN PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY, AUGUST 9.

SUBSIDY TO THE AMEER OF AFGHANISTAN.

Earl STANHOPE asked the Under Secretary of State for India whether he would now explain the conditions upon which the Government of India had undertaken to pay Abdurrahman a subsidy of £120,000 a year; whether any treaty had been made with him; and whether the treaty, or any other engagement that might have been entered into, contained favourable stipulations for the admission of British commerce into Afghanistan.

The Earl of KIMBERLEY said: My answer to the noble earl's question is this:—The annual subsidy of twelve lakhs of rupees is given as a subsidy personal to the Ameer Abdurrahman as an aid towards meeting his present difficulties in the management of his State, to be devoted to the defence of his territories. No treaty has been concluded with the Ameer, nor have any engagements been entered into as to commerce.

Earl STANHOPE asked whether there were no conditions attached to the grant of the subsidy.

The Earl of KIMBERLEY: I have given a precise answer to the noble earl as to the terms of the subsidy has been given to the Ameer.

INDIAN RAILWAYS.

Mr. PULESTON asked the Under Secretary of State for India whether he desired it to be understood that the large average of the dividends mentioned as earned on Indian railways was calculated on the whole capital guaranteed by the Government up to the present time, or only on that portion represented by finished railways and in regular working order; and when the official report on that subject to which he referred would be laid upon the table of the House.

Mr. J. K. CROSS: The dividend of 5·37 per cent. mentioned by my hon. friend as earned by Indian railways last year was calculated on the capital of all the lines which were open for traffic. The amount of this capital is 143 crores of rupees, or nominally £143,000,000 sterling. The report in question was presented on the 16th of July. It is still in the hands of the printers.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY, AUGUST 13.

THE SUBSIDY TO THE AMEER.

Mr. COWEN asked the Under Secretary of State for India whether any information had been received from India respecting the subsidy to be paid to the Ameer of Afghanistan; and whether he was now in a position to state to the House the services the Ameer was to render in return for £120,000.

Mr. CROSS: The annual subsidy of 12 lakhs of rupees is given as a subsidy personal to the Ameer Abdurrahman as an aid towards meeting his present difficulties in the management of his State, to be devoted to the payment of his troops, and to other measures which may be required for the defence of his territories. No treaty has been concluded with the Ameer.

Mr. COWEN asked if no conditions accompanied the subsidy. Previous Ameers had had subsidies, but they had, in consequence, extended to the British Government some powers—the liberty to have a Resident, agents on the frontiers, and other facilities, and there was a distinct stipulation that the foreign policy of Afghanistan should be regulated and controlled by the British Government in India. He wished to know whether any such stipulations were made on this occasion.

Mr. CROSS: No such conditions have been imposed upon the Ameer.

Mr. COWEN gave notice that on the Indian Budget he would call attention to the subject.

Mr. ONSLOW inquired whether arms and ammunition had been given, as well as the £125,000.

Mr. CROSS: No; no arms or ammunition. If any more questions are to be put, I shall be very much obliged if hon. members will give notice.

Mr. ONSLOW: I beg to give notice that in consequence of the way in which the hon. gentleman answers my questions, in future I shall put all such questions to the Prime Minister.

Mr. GLADSTONE: I beg to say in that case, if the hon. gentleman contemplates putting questions to me, owing to his disapproval of the answers given by my hon. friend, I shall not think it my duty to take over the duties of my hon. friend.

THE MADRAS CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. GIBSON asked the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Secretary of State for India had yet reconsidered the grievances of the Madras Civil Service, and the working of the concessions made by him last year, in order partially to relieve the block of promotion in the service; and whether there had been any recent communication with the Simla Government on the subject; and, if so, with what result.

Mr. CROSS: No communication has yet been received from the Government of India upon the subject of the representations made to them by the Government of Madras some time ago, to the effect that the extent to which the offer of proportionate expenses had been accepted during the past year did not offer the relief which was expected to result from it. A difference of opinion having arisen between the Governments of Madras and Bombay as to the date from which the payment of the special or minimum allowances to certain members of the Madras Civil Service was sanctioned, the matter was referred to the Secretary of State, who has approved the orders issued by the Government of India, which ruled that, as in usual in such cases, these allowances should take effect from the date of the receipt in India of the despatch of the Secretary of State sanctioning the scheme.

Mr. GIBSON asked whether the Secretary of State had given his decision in favour of the Civil Service.

Mr. CROSS said that no communication on the subject had been received from India, and therefore the Secretary of State could not consider it.

THE DIAMANTE BRILLIANTS.

W. THORNHILL &amp; CO., Sole Agents.

The Reputation of the "DIAMANTE BRILLIANTS," originally introduced into England by W. THORNHILL and CO. is now permanently established. The success of their enterprise has surpassed their most sanguine expectations. "DIAMANTE BRILLIANTS" afford the only instance, hitherto attained, of the absolutely perfect representation of the real diamonds by artificial means. These remarkable stones, by their purity and brilliancy, support comparison with diamonds of the first water, and are undistinguishable therefrom. They are infinitely superior in every respect to real diamonds of inferior quality. DIAMANTE BRILLIANTS were exposed side by side with real diamonds of great value in the Paris Exhibition, 1878, and were awarded a Prize Medal and the highest recognition, awarded to imitations. They attracted universal attention and admiration, and forthwith became much in vogue with the grande monde and elite of society. They are now worn at the Court balls, and upon all occasions in London, Paris, and St. Petersburg. They are invaluable for intermixing with and replacing pearls and other costly diamond ornaments. DIAMANTE BRILLIANTS can be worn at all times, even by daylight, with confidence and absolute security. They possess the penetrating brilliancy and lustre peculiar to real diamonds, and the connoisseurs guarantee the surplus and pleasure of purchasers. The perfection thus attained is the result of investigations and experiments extending over two generations. The cost, nevertheless, of the DIAMANTE BRILLIANTS is about 1-30th that of real diamonds.

ALLEN'S INDIAN MAIL.

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 22, 1883.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

Our advices by the overland mail are, from Bombay, July 24; Madras and Allahabad, July 23; Calcutta, July 21.

We understand that Dr. Gustav Oppert, professor of Sanskrit in the Presidency College, Madras, is likely to be the delegate for India at the International Congress of Orientalists to be held at Leyden between the 10th and 15th September. A better choice could not have been made by the Secretary of State. The qualifications of this accomplished scholar are too well known to all our readers to call for any notice in these columns.

The forthcoming report of the Education Commission is being looked for with keen interest throughout India; and we believe there is good reason for the general expectation that its value will be equal to the importance of its subject, and the pains and expense that have been bestowed upon it. The possibilities are simply magnificent; and we are quite sure that every true friend of Lord Ripon will join us in expressing a hope that, after all the troubles and will-o'-the-wisp wanderings of the past twelve months, His Excellency may after all turn back from his more revolutionary schemes, and be content to reap the rich harvest of fame that is sure to accrue from a thoroughly liberal educational policy. The establishment of a system that shall render a large extension of primary education compatible with the full maintenance and hearty support of the State colleges, that are so justly prized by the educated Indian community, will be an achievement of the very first rank—an achievement of which the glory will endure long after the memory of mischievous Land Bills and cruel Ilbert Bills shall have passed away like evil dreams.

The news this week is serious from the North West Provinces and the adjacent districts of the Punjab. There is talk of a "complete failure" of the crop on the unirrigated lands in some districts, unless rain should fall within a week; whilst the ill effects of the drought are very widely felt elsewhere, even now.

The thought that this incompetent and disorganised Government may have to cope with a real and terrible difficulty like that of a famine in Northern India, in addition to all the evil results of its own folly and mismanagement, must surely sober even the most fanatical of its supporters. Hitherto all Lord Ripon's difficulties have been of his own creation. His reign has been a season of most bountiful harvests, of peace at any price (the price being left to future consideration), of fat new appointments, and plenty of pickings for the elect. As it was in the days of Noah, so it has been in Lord Ripon's days at Simla. They have been eating and drinking, and marrying and giving in marriage; and as if in pure wantonness, they have brought in Ilbert Bills to "crush" the non-official Anglo-Indians, and Tenancy Bills to plunder the Bengal Zemindars, for lack of better employment. They have made sport of the fears and sufferings of the classes they have attacked; but Lord Ripon and his friends will sorely need the aid of those very classes before long, if the ominous warnings of the present week are unhappily fulfilled. The first real note of famine-alarm—if the famine should prove to be anything like those with which Lord Northbrook and Lord Lytton successfully grappled—must be for Lord Ripon as the handwriting on the wall, "Thou art weighed in the balances and art found wanting."

At the very time when it seems as if we might hear of any moment the tidings of the approach of this dread calamity, Lord Ripon's Government is outraging even the commonest decency, by doggedly refusing to expedite the publication of the reports of the Local Governments on the Ilbert Bill. The whole thing is really too pitiable. Everybody knows perfectly well how utterly the weight of official opinion is against Lord Ripon's sentimentalism—just as everyone knew how entirely the knowledge and experience of the High Court condemned it for at least a month before the letter of the High Court was allowed by Government to appear. And yet, every artifice known to red-tape is employed to delay the production of the damning evidence. The reports are long, and have to be circulated; the printers are slow—they always are on such occasions; there is need of special accuracy; and many printers' errors have to be corrected; and so forth. And why is all this thus? Why, if the reports can only be kept back long enough, Parliament will be up; already the most formidable critics of Lord Ripon's antics have left town. And, moreover, if Mr. Poggio and Mr. Bright have only time enough to work on the credulity of the Liberal party in England before the authoritative exposition of the facts is published, there is good hope that Mr. Gladstone may be "run in" by the Radicals, and that the Ministry may commit itself irretrievably to this iniquitous measure. If we had not known for certain that the present Government is that of the Party of Righteousness, we should hardly have guessed it from recent manifestations.

The Sheffield Daily Telegraph thus dwells on the culpable ignorance displayed by Mr. Bright and his abettors in dealing with the Ilbert Bill:—

"The papers, such as Allen's Indian Mail, which devote themselves specially to the affairs of our Empire in the East, are making merry, so far as mirth may be allowable on a subject so important, over Mr. Bright's extraordinary blunder, as to the real nature of the Ilbert Bill. Mr. Bright, in effect, described that Bill as one permitting a few native judges, who are members of the Covenanted Civil Service—i.e., who have been educated here and gone back to India under the same conditions as our own Indian Civil Servants—to try Europeans accused of crimes. An Englishwoman promptly pointed out that the Bill proposes to confer powers of jurisdiction over Englishmen upon four new classes of judges:—(1), Native Covenanted Civilians; (2), Statutory Civilians; (3), Assistant Commissioners; (4), Cantonment Magistrates; and she added, forcibly, 'It is the first class which has exclusively attracted the attention of the English supporters of the Bill. It is singular that the second and third, of which nothing is heard in England, should be those which have fixed the attention and opposition of those Anglo-Indians who do not base their objections to the Bill upon race distinctions. No one is disturbed by the fourth class; it is not likely ever to include any but Englishmen.' The men into whose hands it is proposed to put power to try, not only Englishmen, but Englishwomen, have not been educated in England; they neither know nor appreciate English social customs nor Christian morality. And yet all over the country partisans of the Government, while defending the Bill, show, like Mr. Bright, that they have not even a rudimentary idea of what that ill-considered measure proposes."

"Our confession is good for the soul,"—The Bombay Gazette, which has all along been one of the strongest supporters of the Criminal Procedure Code Amendment Bill, now says,—"Had Mr. Branson and Britannicus, and the rest of them, left the measure within the pale of reasonable discussion, we should in all probability have opposed it. The administrative inconvenience which it was intended to anticipate has not actually arisen, and it could very well have waited until the necessity for it had become more obvious." On reading this Lord Ripon may well exclaim, "Et tu, Brute." And so it appears that it was not conviction as to the merits of the measure, but jealousy of the opposition begun in Calcutta, that has caused our contemporary to support the Bill.

The correspondent who writes the following letter to the Indian Mirror wants to know who is going to keep the cash-box of Mr. Surendranath Bannerji's National Fund. He says, with pardonable curiosity:—

"SIR,—I wish to subscribe my mite to the National Fund. Will you or any of your numerous readers inform me, firstly, to whom am I to send in my subscription; secondly, whether any acknowledgment will be made in the public prints; thirdly, who are the members of the committee of the National Fund and who the trustees; fourthly, to what definite purposes will the fund be appropriated; and, fifthly, what about the subscription raised in aid of the fund for the establishment of a permanent delegate in England?—Yours, &c.,

“SHAMA CHARAN SEN.”

WE are glad to hear that Mr. Charles Marvin's courage and enterprise are once more to be utilised in a novel field. He left London on the 15th inst., under a commission from the Morning Post, for a tour through South Russia and the Caucasus, returning either by the Volga or through Constantinople. His letters are sure to be interesting.

THE Liberal has some wise remarks on the “National Fund” meeting. It says:—

“The Indian Association called a monster open air meeting on Tuesday last at Beadon-street to consider the best means of raising a national fund for purposes of constitutional agitation both here and in England. So far as numbers went, the meeting was a tremendous success; and as for the speeches, it would be enough to say that the meeting was addressed by Babu Surendra Nath Banerjee and Kali Charan Banerjee. We wish we could say as much of the objects which brought together this vast sea of human heads. The worst that could be said of them was that they were so vague. We have read Babu Surendra Nath's speech and we do not find, except in one passage, any trace of a practical suggestion. The one suggestion which he put forth is one which is not encouraging. He wanted to utilise the services of the Indian womanhood in the political elevation of the country. The speaker happened to receive many tokens of sympathy from a number of Indian ladies, while he was in prison; and this has suggested to him the idea we have alluded to above. We will not call the scheme utopian, till we hear something more definite about it. But if that be one of the means of creating constitutional agitation in England and in India, we do not think we shall have much to say in favour of the attempt. Everyone knows the amount of abuse to which we are subjected in consequence of the Criminal Bill agitation; is it definitely proposed to carry harmless and helpless ladies through the dirt of all this Billingsgate?”

A VALUABLE new medicament, likely to prove an important addition to the medicine-chest of every Anglo-Indian—and one that has already received the highest testimony to its beneficial effects in tropical climates—has been lately given to the world in “Lister's Long-Life Salt, or Effervescing Saline Powder.” We understand that it is now widely used in the tropical regions of South America, and it will doubtless find equal acceptance in India.

THE Times, commenting on Mr. Gladstone's speech last night, says:—

“Much less satisfactory was Mr. Gladstone's reference to the Ilbert Bill. On the strength of doubtful analogies, and in the face of evidence which still accumulates, as telegrams published by us from India show, Mr. Gladstone persists in treating the opposition to the Bill as temporary, and as due to a “superstition” which must be outlived. His remarks betray indifference to the practically universal expressions of Indian opinion; and it is to be hoped that a closer examination of the facts than this speech indicates will induce the Government to pause before they press a measure which offends so many.”

How many members of Parliament were left in town to hear Mr. Cross's statement on the Indian Budget? This Government of all the virtues, the Government that is so devoted to the interests of India as to insist on both the Ilbert Bill and on the payment by India of the Egyptian war-charges, has at last actually accomplished the feat—notable because of its shamelessness—of relegating the Indian Budget statement to the concluding forty-eight hours of the Parliamentary Session. Well may Mr. Onslow suggest that, since Mr. Gladstone's Government makes the Budget statement a farce, Mr. Cross should quietly send his speech to the papers and have done with it, without troubling those members who, like Mr. Onslow and a few other Conservatives, still have a conscience.

THE following interesting statement we take from the

THE CHELSEA RADICAL CLUBS AND LORD RIPON'S INDIAN POLICY.

The combined Political Committee of the four Radical clubs of the Borough of Chelsea—viz., the Eleusis Club, the Hammersmith Club, the Progressive Club, and the Cobden Club—passed the following resolution at their last meeting:—“That the combined Political Committee of the four Radical clubs of the Borough of Chelsea is of opinion that the policy of the Marquis of Ripon in India is calculated to promote the well-being of all classes of Her Majesty's Indian subjects, and pledge themselves to do all things which lay in their power to enable the Bill introduced by Mr. Ilbert in the Legislative Council of India to become law.”

THE following with respect to the Freight Market is corrected up to July 28:—

“The slight improvement in rates which we had to quote last week has entirely disappeared. Several outside steamers made an unexpected appearance in our market, and this, with large arrivals of sailing tonnage and a decided scarcity in the supply of produce, had its usual effect, and rates all round must be quoted considerably lower. Two steamers have been chartered for the U. K., and one has secured a full cargo for London; one sailing vessel has berthed for London, one for Liverpool, and one has been chartered for New York. There is, however, little inquiry for tonnage in any direction. Our unfixed tonnage amounts to nearly 49,000 tons.”

WITH respect to the Indigo Market, we extract the following from the circular of Messrs. William Moran & Co.:—

“The weather during the past fortnight has on the whole been favourable in Behar, although there are some complaints of too much rain at some factories and too little at others, and produce generally shows some improvement. Of the three districts, Champaran is the most advanced, and bids fair, so far as first cuttings are concerned, to turn out as much as last year, and perhaps even rather more, whereas it is doubtful if the morhun outturn in Tirhoot and Chuprah will equal that of last season. From Lower Bengal there is little or no change to report, and prospects generally are much the same as at the date of our last circular. Good rain has fallen pretty generally since our last issue over most of the Benares and North-Western Provinces, and prospects have improved; with good manufacturing weather the outturn should be a good one.”

THE same firm thus reports with respect to the Tea Market:—

“On the 19th instant 9,529 chests were offered and 9,175 were sold. The demand was entirely for good liquoring and fine teas, others meeting with but little competition. We quote medium and common qualities half an anna lower. On the 26th instant, 11,657 chests were offered, and about 11,000 were sold. Fine qualities, and especially Darjeeling kinds were again in request, their teas being very difficult of sale except at lower rates. We think it is advisable to point out that of the packages sent down this year, the proportion of half chests to chests is unduly large; of about 45,000 packages sold here to date 15,000 have been half chests. Small packages are not desired for shipment to London, on account of the loss to shippers occasioned by the extra proportionate allowance for draft. Some few loss of fine teas in half chests may do well, for any other class of tea full chests are preferable. Last year small packages were in favour with shippers to Australia but there is at present but little demand in that quarter.”

THE Bombay Gazette gives the following obituary of the week:—Surg. P. M. Grant, 1st C. I. Horse, Agra, Western Malwa, of cholera; Mr. W. Hamilton, honorary surgeon, Madras; Mr. W. M. Inglis, Simla; the Rev. G. W. Legate, Church of Scotland Mission, Beyrout; Mr. P. Parkinson, chief stationmaster, Allahabad.

THE WEATHER AND THE CROPS.

THE following is the official summary of the report of the Revenue and Agricultural Department on the state of the weather and condition of the crops throughout India, for the week ended July 17:—

“Heavy rain fell during the past week along the Western Ghats from Travancore as far north as Baroda and Surat. At Baroda the river overflowed its banks, stopping communication and damaging property. A break is much wanted in Surat and neighbourhood. In Sind prospects are improving with the rise of the river. Seasonable weather prevails over the Ganges, but in parts of Mysore and of the Southern Mahratta Country more rain is needed. General, and in most places, rain has fallen throughout the Berars, the Central India States, and Rajputana. The tanks in Marwar continue empty and water is scarce, but the recent rain has much improved prospects. The rainfall has been generally less in Assam and Burma, and slightly increased in Bengal compared with the previous week. More rain is, however, required in some districts of Bengal for the rice crop. In the Central Provinces there has been heavy rain at Jubbulpore, and the weather continues generally favourable to agricultural operations. Rain fell during the week throughout the North-Western Provinces and Punjab, but in most districts it has been slight and insufficient. The latest weather telegrams report rain from most stations, except in the north of the Punjab. There is hardly any change to record in agricultural operations. Harvesting is going on in Madras and Mysore, transplanting of rice on the western coast and throughout Bengal, Assam, and Burma. In parts of Bengal and Assam it is retarded for want of sufficient rain. Early rice and jute are being gathered in some districts of the former province. Ploughing and sowing for the kharif are approaching completion in Bombay, the Berars, and Central Provinces, and are in general progress in Northern India, although delayed in parts by insufficient rain. Young locusts are appearing in the Deccan districts and form an increasing source of danger to the young crops. Some destruction has been caused in Baroda by floods. In Orissa the damage apprehended from excessive rain has proved slight and partial. The public health is generally good, but the mortality from cholera is still severe in two districts of the Bombay Presidency. Prices show a further rise in the North West Provinces."

TELEGRAPHIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE following is the usual weekly telegram from the Times correspondent, dated Calcutta, August 19:—

"The agitation against the Bengal Tenancy Bill is rapidly spreading throughout the province. The latest meeting of which we have heard was held at Dacca, the Nawab Ahsanollah Khan Bahadoor presiding. Resolutions were passed to the effect that the provisions of the Bill were subversive of the rights of the landholders, as guaranteed by the permanent settlement; that if those rights were taken away compensation should be given; that the Bill was of a revolutionary nature, and proposed the redistribution of property in land upon an unfair basis; that its immediate effect would be to create endless litigation between landlords and tenants; and that a memorial should be submitted to the Viceroy, setting forth the views of the landholders of Eastern Bengal.

"The long delay made by the Government before publishing the provincial reports sent in on the subject of Mr. Ilbert's Bill is causing great and increasing dissatisfaction. Had each of the reports been despatched to England as soon as it was received, some at least of them might have been laid before Parliament by this time. It is now unlikely that they will arrive before the end of the session. So strong is the public feeling on this subject that the European and Anglo-Indian Defence Association has called a meeting for next Thursday to protest against the delay which has already occurred, and to urge the Government not to proceed with the Bill until all the official opinions have been laid before Parliament.

"The result of the loan which was announced on Tuesday last was somewhat of a surprise, as a considerably higher rate was obtained than had been generally expected. The figures are as follow:—Aggregate amount of tenders, 13,42,05,500 rupees. Minimum rate accepted, £98 9s. Tenders at that rate received, 70 per cent. Total amount of accepted tenders, 2,50,00,000 rupees. Total amount to be received by Government, 2,46,55,685. Average rate at which loan issued, £98 10s.

"The resolution published in the last Government Gazette amounts practically to an admission that the lately-established scheme of an issue of stock notes has been a failure. The chief objections to these notes seem to be that the holder cannot sell them except at a discount, that the interest on the note of one circle is not payable in another circle, and that there is great difficulty in recovering the value of lost or destroyed notes. These objections are discussed at some length, and the Governor-General invites the opinions of the local administrations and Chambers of Commerce before arriving at any final decision.

"It is reported that the experimental scheme lately sanctioned by the Secretary of State for the establishment of four Circuit Courts of Intermediate Appeal in Bengal is not likely to receive the support of the High Court. It is not, moreover, likely to commend itself to the favourable consideration of the Civil Service. The mistake has been made of fixing the pay of the Judges at 2,500 rupees per month, which is the same amount as that of the salary of a first-grade district; and the best judicial officers will hardly care to exchange the comparative ease of a district Judgeship for the heavier work of a circuit court without any increase of salary. Moreover, the fact that the Secretary of State considers it unnecessary to specify the classes from which the Judges are to be selected causes the scheme to be regarded with suspicion.

"The Indian Government steamer Amberwitch, which was despatched on the 19th of July in search of the crew of the wrecked steamer Knight of the Bath, arrived at Bombay last Sunday, having succeeded in rescuing the captain and sixteen men out of a complement of thirty-three hands. The Knight of the Bath left Bombay on the 12th of June for Havre. It appears that she struck on Kooria Moor Islands, on the 18th of June. Great difficulty was experienced in lowering the boats, owing to the heavy sea which was rolling, and some lives were lost. Eventually the survivors succeeded in landing at Hades, on the morning of the 19th of June. They were immediately seized and plundered by the Arabs. After wandering for some time they reached a fishing village, where they were hospitably maintained for forty-five days. The discovery of the castaways was due to the lucky accident that while the Amberwitch was cruising off the coast an escaped slave swam to her, and was taken on board. His master, who followed him gave information of the situation of the wrecked crew, who were thereupon taken off by the Amberwitch. The chief officer and the first and second engineers of the Knight of the Bath were lost.

"It is probable that an Agricultural Department will soon be established in Bengal. The Lieutenant-Governor proposes to begin with a school and farm on the Government estate at Nazirgunge, in Shahabad, the management of it being entrusted to a young civilian who has shown special qualifications for such work. The school is intended to be used for the training of managers for the estates of Government wards.

"The harvest prospects in the south-east of the Punjab are causing much anxiety. Some fear is entertained of a complete failure of the crop on the lands which are not irrigated in the Delhi and Hissar divisions, unless rain falls within a week. Prices are rising.

"A committee of engineers has been appointed for the purpose of considering various matters in connection with the constitution of the Public Works Department; for example, the reduction of the numerical strength of the department, consistently with its efficiency, the acceleration of promotion, the offer of terms upon retirement, and the proportions in which the department shall be recruited from the ranks of the Royal Engineers, of the civil engineers of England, and of the students of the Indian colleges. Mr. Grulford Molesworth will preside. The committee consists of ten members, representing different classes—namely, two Stanley engineers, three from Cooper's-hill, two Royal Engineers, and three gentlemen from the Roorkes Presidency College—ordinary civil engineers.

"Sir Robert Sandeman has made a successful march with a small column of troops through the Kakar country to Thull Chotiali. He was well received by the chiefs and people."

THE same correspondent also telegraphed, under date August 16:—

"CALCUTTA, AUG. 16.—A public meeting is to be held next Thursday for the purpose of memorialising the Viceroy to abstain from proceeding further with the Criminal Jurisdiction Bill, until Parliament has had an opportunity of considering and weighing the official and other opinions upon the subject of the measure, which have been submitted to the Government. Your Singapore correspondent telegraphs that the Siamese Embassy which has been despatched to England and America left to-day by the steamer Sindh. The party includes two princes of the blood, three princesses, four attachés, and twenty-one attendants."

And again on August 20:—

"CALCUTTA, AUG. 20.—The British Resident at Hyderabad and the Governor-General's Agent for Rajpootana have submitted to the Government strong protests against Mr. Ilbert's Bill."

THE following telegrams have been received through Reuter's Agency:—

"BOMBAY, AUG. 16.—The Bombay Gazette to day states that the Indian Government has issued a resolution severely censuring the Nawab of Junaghur, and dismissing the Dewan, the Assistant Dewan, and the Police Superintendent from their posts, on account of the massacre of the Maijas on Jan. 28 last. Great anxiety prevails owing to the want of rain in Northern and Central India and in the Bombay Presidency."

"SIMLA, AUG. 16.—An envoy from the Governor-General of Khorassan has arrived at Herat on a visit of ceremony to the Governor of that place. He does not intend to proceed to Cabul. The Ameer's visit to Herat is expected to take place early in the autumn."

"ASTRACHAN, AUG. 16.—The first steamer for Mertvoi Kullink, left here yesterday with a cargo of cotton, which will be forwarded from that place to Central Asia by the land route recently discovered by General Tcherniaeff."

"CALCUTTA, AUG. 16.—An Ambassador from the Shah of Persia has left Herat to seek an interview with the Ameer of Afghanistan."

"SIMLA, AUG. 20.—The Government has no information of the alleged departure from Herat for Cabul of the envoy of the Governor General of Khorassan. The latest intelligence from Herat is to the effect that the envoy did not intend to proceed further than that place.

SELECTED ARTICLES.

THE REV. PROTAP CHUNDER MOZUMDARS LETTER FROM LONDON.

To describe London would be to count the waves of the sea. It is an oft-repeated, vain, useless undertaking. The best I can do is to say how I feel—walking, weary, footsore, or perched on the top of the leviathan omnibus, I can but groan out my experiences. This perpetual peripatetic restlessness is the opposite of all true Aryan repose. These calls, balls, breakfasts, "at homes," and garden parties are not the right path to Nirvana. Mr. Rhys Davids, of Brick Court, Temple, told me that the 80,000 guns were all the offspring of Tamias, and so were absentee landlords, but I think he could include many things more. Nay, I behold humanity, no longer in items, but in grand totals. Oh! the swirling, jumping, bel-lowing, whistling population of the London streets—the crashing, roaring, rumbling traffic. If the vocations, resolutions, desires, disappointments, pursuits, joys, miseries, sins, and virtues of these eddying, ill-dressed, well-dressed, greasy, and scented masses of men and women could be recorded, how many Babels will that make! If the contents of these shops, cellars, garrets, go-downs, houses, hotels, carts, vehicles, and newspapers were recorded, what a universe of created vanities will that make! It is bewildering to observe all this—I am, but an atom in the infinite man. Yet how well kept, well-rounded, self-conscious, self-concentrated, every atom is! A man's only protection against the insanity of centrifugal forces lies here. Another Parsi youth has blown up his brains. London is the pandemonium of unbalanced boys you send in scores. It gives the most ample training for madness and eccentricity. Infuse power and purpose into your youths, give them centre, guidance, recommend them to public opinion when you bid them come here, or the elaborate machinery of civilisation will rush all life, character, and manhood out of them. Wine and women sit at the gates of that civilisation, and many are the victims they take.

MAY MEETINGS.

As the bloom comes to the hawthorn, and the green leaf to the vine and chestnut, so intellectual and sentimental fervour to John Bull's capacious "liver" in the month of May. He winds up his twelve months' work and benevolence by speechifying at Exeter Hall. The enthusiasm is at its white heat, and many a reputation is made or marred in May. The meetings are either religious or social. The former are mostly orthodox, the latter mostly Temperance. Returning from those missionary or propagation of Gospel meetings, it is impossible to conclude that Christian endeavour or Christian faith is waning. Millions of gold are freely spent for the conversion of the heathen and the spread of Christian literature. The orthodox speeches are not very fine, but the practices are glorious. May their efforts never grow less. The social meetings are no less characteristic. The cause of Temperance has perceptibly advanced during the last ten years. Not only have Local Option and Sunday Closing Bills made considerable progress in Parliament, but the people have come to be convinced of the evil of drinking. Fine temperance hotels have sprung up both in London and the provinces. A large number of ministers, both Churchmen and Nonconformists, have zealously enlisted themselves as Temperance reformers. Publicans and brewers are distinctly gaining in unpopularity, and coffee houses are multiplying everywhere. I find the anti-opium agitation is also becoming very strong. Though the revenue difficulty of the Indian Government meets with extensive sympathy, to me there seems to be every likelihood of the disgust against opium traffic growing stronger and stronger. Great changes are in store for India. The mill-owners' memorial has created surprise and indignation in every one who has seen it. The recklessness of Government policy in liquor traffic, you may rest assured, is now doomed.

ANGLO-INDIAN AT HOME.

With a blazing cheerful fire by his side, long packets of paper before him, paler and thinner than he ever was in India, sits the Earl of Northbrook in his official residence at the Admiralty. He is thoughtful, inquisitive, kind-hearted, and just. His presence is a consolation and encouragement to every Indian who has the privilege to see him. His interest in great questions is unabated, and he is the natural guide of the Indian policy of Her Majesty's Government. Speaking of the agitation on the Criminal Procedure Amendment Bill he said, "My excellent countrymen in India are sometimes stark mad, I am sorry to say." And then he examined the nature of the small measure that is before the Council. The conversation left but little doubt that Mr. Ilbert's Bill would pass. Only the application of the principle and privileges of the bill would be very limited at first. The Conservatives, you know, have made a great party question of it; and that model orator, Lord George Hamilton, wise as he is young, is trying to act the rôle of a London Brabour.

Sir Arthur Hobhouse is busy as ever, and Lady Hobhouse as serene and motherly as before. Their home at Burton-road is the resort of many Anglo-Indians, and some distinguished Hindus. They are both in sound health, their Indian symptoms matured by the action of a noble and vigorous English atmosphere of thought. It was in their house you meet with Sir George Campbell, like an aged kite, whose youth has ceased to be renovated. Whiteness, hobbling, uttering feeble sentences, the fallen hero picks his way through the room. But he is a staunch Liberal for all that, speaking in and out of season. It is there you meet with Sir Richard Temple with his Star of India round his neck. It is there you meet with Rajah Rampal Sing, busy with English and Indian politics, but desirous of inviting everybody to dinner.

INDIA OFFICE.

But, if you wish to contemplate the great variety of Anglo-Indian officials, you cannot do better than perambulate the India Office. There the atmosphere is calm, and silence reigns. The laced and lettered messengers flit out and in; the helmeted policeman as sentry is black, funeral, and solemn; thoughtful owls and dancing girls darkened with smoke, are carved out of the stone cornice. It is a place where the whole world might well go to sleep. You behold Sir William Muir, bright and tall, sitting at his table leisurely, and reciting Hindi proverbs. One of these I remember. In speaking of Rajah Shiva Pershad, he said, "Shiva Pershad is a Dhobi-ka-kutta, na gharka, na ghatka. He has neither pleased the people nor the Government, pulling now for one, and now for the other." Sir Barrow Ellis is nursing his gout and making himself useful in the Northbrook Club, which I don't think will come to much good. The small young Indians will find it too big a place to find themselves in element. The big officials will find it too small a place to find themselves in element. It is destined, I am afraid, to remain as a respectable anachronism well endowed, well inaugurated, but without practical interest to anyone. Sir Bartle Frere lives at Wimbledon, a suburban paradise, where cabmen are insolent, roads are steep, and dust is plentiful. Lady Frere does the hospitality, abuses the Government, and Sir Bartle is taciturn, only consenting to show himself. The Anglo-Indian is not uncompanionable in London by any means. There are great shiploads of them coming. They have created some opinion on the Ilbert Bill. One hears a good deal of Mr. Norris, your judge, from Unitarians both of Bristol and London. He is liked by a few who know him best. But they say the attack on him in the Bengali was injudicious. Mr. Norris, before he leaves India, will make himself yet felt.

JOHN BRIGHT AT BREAKFAST.

John Bright eats his breakfast like a lion, and digests it too. But he does not drink. He is a broad, middle-sized man with great soft hands, and an enormous appetite. I have seen him finish off the plentiful morning meal with half a jug of milk and a good lump of solid sugar which he puts into his mouth somewhat surreptitiously. John calls out for cigars when the rest of the eating is done. He produces from his well-worn pouch different sizes, and if any of his companions are conscientious about smoking, presents him with a small and mild Havanna. He sat at table the observed of all observers. They asked him all manner of questions, and at last the subject of Indian administration turned up. "There is no man fit to govern India at the present moment," said he, "except perhaps Gladstone; but we cannot expect more than one Gladstone in a century, and he has plenty to do at home." He was asked what sort of Government he would propose for India. He said he would desire the abolition of the post of Governor-General who, chiefly confined to Bengal, did not see enough of the country. Difficulties often arose between the Viceroy and the Provincial Governors whose local experience often gave them an advantage over him. Difficulties also often arose between Her Majesty's Minister at home and the Governor-General, who, if he was a man of ability and honesty, did not quietly submit to the dictation of the India Office. Again in the case of an ambitious man like Lord Dalhousie, or an incompetent man like Lord Lytton, the whole country was precipitated into complications and hostilities which men with smaller jurisdiction might not incur. He would, therefore, break up the present Government of India into smaller Governorships with direct relations to the Government at home, each with its provincial army and powers over taxation and revenue. It is impossible, he said, to expect that the Indian population could ever form one nation. It is absurd to think that 250 millions of men and women can consider themselves one people. So the best way of connecting them together would be to help them to form a number of small distinct nationalities according to their origin, antecedents, sympathies, and dialects. This unity the governments which he proposed ought to promote. India, said Mr. Bright, had been acquired by enormous crimes. The English Government can only atone for them by teaching the people how to govern themselves. For, in the course of time, near or remote, England shall have to leave India to itself, if the teachings of history be true. It may, perhaps, not be the Indians who will compel her to do so, the affairs of Europe will some day compel her to do so. It is not in the nature of things that 50 millions of men can hold 250 for ever. When England leaves, if one may venture to indulge in a little prophecy, the people of India will first quarrel, the powerful among them trying to conquer the less powerful, and then they will settle down not into one government, nor into one nationality, but different small organisations of Government. He proposed to anticipate that contingency, by providing for it in the plan thus laid out by himself.

The conversation then turned upon the present agitation in India. "I hope," said Mr. Bright, "Lord Ripon will serve out his full term, get the Bill passed, and then return home. I have known Lord Ripon since he was a child, who has ever been faithfully attached to the Liberal interests. His conversion into Roman Catholicism for a time cast some darkness over his name. But they did not know the causes, and therefore blamed him. He had few relatives of his own, and his wife's brothers and sisters were like his own relatives. The tragical death of Mr. Vining at the hand of Greek bandits exercised a strange effect on his mind, and led him to take a different view of human life. No one has ever dared to doubt his earnestness or sincerity. Little before he started for India I met Lord Ripon one day at Piccadilly going towards Kensington, and asked him about his appointment. 'Rest assured,' said Lord Ripon, 'any change in my religious belief has made no change in my political principles. I have been offered by Mr. Gladstone this great appointment, and I will try to discharge its duties faithfully.'" Mr. Bright expressed the highest confidence in the character and principles of Lord Ripon. He spoke, I am sorry to say, most contemptuously of the East Indians and Eurasians who have joined the agitation. "Do they know," he asked, "that all Englishmen strongly dislike them? What do they hope to gain from identifying themselves against men with whom they hold every interest in common?" I could not answer this question. He then came to speak of a great many Indian gentlemen whom he personally knew and among others of Mr. Lal Mohun Ghose. He said, the people of India had in later times gained a good deal of political power. He laid great stress on the liberty of the Press. The conversation just for a moment turned on the Bengali contempt of court case. Mr. Bright's opinion of Sir Richard Garth's abilities is anything but complimentary. But Mr. Bright said the editor of the Bengali had done a foolish thing, only he had suffered more for it than he ever deserved.

On being asked whether India could ever hope to gain the right of electing her representatives for the British Parliament, he said "that was not possible, for the simple reason that you would absolutely swamp us with your votes." But he said an Indian could very well represent an English constituency if it would have him. This was very largely a question of expense. He had been once or twice spoken to on this subject by Indian gentlemen in England. But after these men went back to their native country he never heard from them again. He said there still rang in his mind a simple sentence which had been uttered by a Hindu who had come to see him—"No one ever cared for my poor country!" Mr. Bright spoke with touching admiration of Sir Salar Jung, and fully dwelt upon the espionage and ill-treatment under which he had to drag the latter part of his life. There is quite one opinion on this subject and the restoration of the Berars in England. They are all waiting to see what is next going to be done in the Nizam's Government. Mr. Bright sets his face against violent agitation of every kind. He said, "Never be persuaded to use violence, either in speech or act. Every reform has to be won constitutionally, inch by inch, in this country. Be not tired to try to obtain your rights. You have already obtained some, you shall have more. But never be violent in anything. All progress has its laws, and laws act slowly. If you do not get all you want, your children will. What our fathers did not have, we have. The future must be allowed to mend the past."

Thus the breakfast was to us a feast of ideas and flow of soul. The remnants of food were removed. The cigars were finished, the ashes grew cold on the saucers, we all got up. And as I was going to leave, Mr. Bright asked me how the missionaries of the Brahmo Somaj found their living. When he heard they took no salary, and devoted their whole time and energy to the work of the Church, he exclaimed, "I see, they rely upon Providence to feed them. Well, there is a great deal in that. It is not everyone that can rely upon Providence, but those who can need look up to no other support." The Conservatives in the House of Commons under Sir Stafford Northcote charged Mr. Bright with a sort of libel, otherwise called "breach of privilege." But they had to withdraw their charge, and the motion was thrown out by a majority of votes.

Such is John Bright, the people's tribune. He is the type of the true Englishman, firm, bold, truthful, and profoundly religious. His honour and affection for Gladstone are great, and there is no doubt his feelings are reciprocated. They make England what she now is. And long may John Bright live and work for the benefit of his countrymen and the welfare of mankind.

THE ZEMINDARS AND THE RYOTS: LORD RIPON'S PROGRESS IN STIRRING UP CLASS-WARS.

The Zemindars are organising meetings in different parts of the country, with a view to protest against the Rent Bill. We have no objection to these proceedings. They are perfectly constitutional, and the Zemindars must, of course, protect their own interests, when they think they have been threatened, by any proposed measure on the part of the Government. But it is the duty of the friends of the ryots also to strengthen the hands of the Government, and help it to pass the Bill. The Indian Association should lose no time in helping the ryots, at this important crisis. They should follow the example which the Zemindars have set, and obtain, from the ryots, the expression of their opinion. The friends of the ryots should be active while this splendid field of duty lies before them.—The Bengalee (Mr. Surendra Nath Banerjee's Paper.)

MR. BRIGHT'S SLANDERS ECHOED IN INDIA.

THE Amrita Bazar Patrika says:—

"The Englishman publishes the advertisement about the Anglo-Indian Ilbert meeting held at St. James's Hall, London, and the list of the general committee. In the list we see the names of many old Anglo-Indians, and of some who had the reputation of being, while here, very friendly to the people of India. The list is a curious document, and is very suggestive in many ways. The long advertisement appeared in all the leading papers of London, and it would thus appear that money was spent like water for the purposes of the meeting. But that is a concern of the Defence Association, though we must protest against this spending of Indian money in a foreign country to patronise foreign journals when there are many here in a starving condition. Talking of the application of Indian money, the list gives only a faint idea of the pensions that the Indian taxpayers are to pay to retired Anglo-Indians. These Indian Nawabs live in England at the expense of the poor ryot, and are paid for services which the ungrateful Indian will never be able to appreciate. In India most of these Anglo-Indians were paid for the purpose of oppressing those who paid them, and now they live upon Indian money spent in England, no doubt to the delight of the starving millions of India. There is a story of a man who after having oppressed his benefactor was at last obliged to die. But death did not deliver the benefactor from the clutches of his foe, for the latter, after death, became a ghost, and yet continued his oppressions of throwing bones and dirt at his old benefactor. It was thought that the Indians had done with those who had been paid for oppressing them. But though dead to India except, of course, about the matter of their pensions by the Indian ryot, these ghosts of Anglo-Indians, as would appear from the meeting held the other day, have not lost their old love for India."

CORRESPONDENCE.

SIR LAURENCE PEARL ON THE ILBERT BILL CONTROVERSY.

TO THE EDITOR OF ALLEN'S "INDIAN MAIL."

SIR,—The practice has prevailed in India now for many years of the Indian Legislature consulting the judges as to a meditated change in the law. Their opinions are delivered under the same sense of responsibility and obligation, if possible, to be correct as judicial opinions are formed and expressed. Of course no infallibility is attributable to them, but no advocacy of a side ought to be laid to their charge. The Chamber of Commerce of Calcutta entrusted, as I am informed, the preparation of their paper to an eminent barrister. I know the gentleman, and respect him highly for his learning and worth. Between his reasoning and that of the judges no material difference is observable, and so far that general agreement tends to establish not simply similarity, but correctness of opinion. It shows calmness of mind and deliberate judgment without inflamed feeling. Some elements of confusion have been introduced into this inquiry. The supposed feelings of Native judges present or future, as affected by the retention of this law as to jurisdiction in its present state, have been put forward as outraged, or likely to be outraged by it. Some have called the law insulting to the Native community. An insult to any Native judge would not only be an insult to Natives, but to the whole English Nation, with the Queen at its head. No one can suppose the framers of the Code of Procedure who retained this part of jurisdiction meant any insult to anybody. No judge of calm mind has ever yet thought himself insulted by a law as to jurisdiction, whether personal or general. Such laws have commonly deep and ancient roots. Whether a privilege be strictly part of "Substantive Law" or part of a law of procedure of the Forum, whether it relate to offence, or only to trial on a charge, are totally fruitless inquiries and distinctions when deeply rooted feelings are pleading earnestly nay, vehemently for the retention of a privilege. The peer of England is for treason and felony triable by his peers. He may be indicted in the ordinary way, but if a Bill be found for either, his mode of trial is then his privilege. In a wider sense it is that of the peers, in a still wider sense it may be called national as involving the notion of Equality, in the favourite sentiment of trial by one's peers. Many portions of the English Law most dear at all times to Englishmen are rather in their own nature parts of the laws of procedure than of Substantive Law, as for instance privileges as to immunity from arrest, jurisdiction, trial, &c., &c., including process. It is therefore no answer to a request that a privilege be retained, to urge it is but procedure, it may nevertheless be regarded as the subject's shield. Now in India the retention in the Mofussil, of the English Law by the English being entirely the result of custom and the force of circumstances, and not, of force, dominion, or power at all, is just as innocent a privilege as any law, custom, and usage of the many and various laws, customs and usages existing in India appertaining to various bodies of men. Amongst these personal laws, some constitute Substantive Law, some procedure, privileges much valued exist as to each. Consequently the Judges make no mistake when they say in substance, the destruction of this particular privilege which works no wrong, would be, without a general destruction of personal laws, a special disfavoured.

No commoner of England ever yet thought himself degraded by a privilege as to trial which he did not share. No judge of the Queen's Bench ever yet thought himself degraded because he could not preside there as judge over a peer indicted there for treason or felony, against whom a true Bill was there found. The privilege is the privilege of the accused, its birth, growth, continuance and allowance, reflect neither honours on those possessing it, nor dishonours on those who have it not, nor is the court or judge empowered to try one jot exalted thereby, in public and rational opinion, over the court or judge wanting that particular jurisdiction. Every judge who really knows and does his duty, sets no value whatever on these really petty distinctions as to jurisdiction; he knows whence his real honour is derived and that nobody can really degrade him but himself.—I have the honour to be, Sir, Your obedient Servant,

LAURENCE PEEL.

INDIA IN PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY, AUGUST 16.

LAND ASSESSMENT IN INDIA.

Mr. WOODALL asked the Under-Secretary for India whether he could state approximately the extent of land in British India which had been re-assessed since the expiry of the last thirty years' settlement; whether the general result of the re-assessment had been greatly to increase the Government demand, and, if so, what was the average percentage of increase; whether there was enacted in the Bombay Presidency in 1879 a new Land Revenue Code, with much more stringent provisions against tenants than the code of 1827, formerly in force; whether it was the case that a tenant could now be taxed in excess of the amount of his fixed assessment on any improvements he might make which made any natural advantage available, and whether this proviso subjected him to a largely-increased land tax on any fields which he might irrigate by water from a well dug entirely at his own cost; whether the code of 1879 contained a provision enabling the British revenue authorities not only to sell up a defaulting cultivator in order to obtain payment of arrears, but to confiscate the holding with all its produce for a similar purpose, irrespective of how much its value might exceed the amount of the said arrears; and if such provision existed, could he state the number of instances in which it had been enforced; and whether he would lay upon the table copies of the code of 1879, and of the former one which it superseded.

Mr. CROSS: The extent of land in British India which has been re-assessed since the expiration of the last thirty years' settlement is approximately 135,000 square miles. The average percentage increase of assessment effected by the revisions is about—in the North-West Provinces, 14 per cent.; in the Punjab, 7 per cent.; and in Bombay, 32 per cent. Some explanations of these enhancements may be necessary. In Upper India—that is, the North-West Provinces and the Punjab—the assessment is a proportion of the rental value of the estate. Under the expired settlement this proportion was two-thirds. Under the revised settlements it is half of the rental value. But the rental has increased so much that the lower proportion now yields more revenue than the higher proportion yielded formerly. There are three reasons for this increase—extension of cultivation, rise of prices, and improvements, such as canals made by Government. In the Bombay Deccan, where the landowners hold direct from Government, the original settlement made about 1840, reduced the old native assessments nearly 50 per cent or from about 1 rupee to about 8 annas per acre. The latter assessment was then equal to about 15 per cent. of the value of the produce. The revised assessment is equal to about 12 per cent., so that the real incidence of the new settlement is lighter than that of the original settlement when introduced. Bombay Act 5 of 1879 consolidated and amended the land revenue law in force at that time. The greater part of the code of 1827 relating to land had already been repealed. Act 5 did not enact more stringent provisions against tenants; the cultivators of Bombay are not tenants, but proprietors under Government, and their legal position has been greatly improved since 1827. A Bombay landholder cannot be taxed on his own improvements, nor, if he digs a well, can his assessment be increased on that account, either during the currency, or on the expiration of the settlement. The case is contained in Sections 106-107 of Act 5. By Section 153 of Act 5 land, the revenue of which is in arrear, is liable to forfeiture and sale to realise the amount of arrears. Should the proceeds exceed the arrear the balance is credited to the defaulter. There is no objection to present a copy of the Bombay Revenue Code 1879, but I cannot lay on the table the law which is superseded, as it is contained in, I think, nineteen separate enactments.

THE INDIAN MEDICAL SERVICE.

Mr. GIBSON asked whether the Secretary of State for India intended to direct an inquiry into the grievances of the Indian Medical Service, with a view to meet some of the expectations with which candidates were induced to enter it, and to restore some contentment to its ranks.

Mr. CROSS: I have several times explained the cause of there being a temporary excess of medical officers who do not hold the substantive appointments which command the higher rates of pay—the grievance to which I understand the right hon. member refers—and I have, at the same time, explained how the difficulty is being met. It is not probable that any inquiry could add to the Secretary of State's information on the subject; and it is not proposed to make any change in the existing system by which officers succeed to substantive medical charges in India.

Mr. GIBSON: I give notice that early next session I shall call attention to the subject, unless a remedy be applied in the meantime.

THE AMEER OF AFGHANISTAN.

Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the Under Secretary of State for India whether he would inquire if the Indian Government had any information regarding the presence of a Russian agent in Afghanistan, his friendly reception by the Governor of Cabul, and his alleged interview with the Ameer; whether he still adhered to his statement that an annual subsidy of £120,000 had been granted to the Ameer without any of the conditions to secure British influence and control, upon which previous Ameers had been subsidised; and what supplies of arms and ammunition had been given to the Ameer Abdurrahman since 1880.

Mr. CROSS: The Indian Government have received information regarding the presence of a Russian merchant, a Mahomedan by religion, in Afghanistan, who had an interview with the Ameer. No importance is attached to the incident by the Government. The hon. member for Eye is mistaken in thinking that I stated that the subsidy of 12 lakhs had been granted "without any of the conditions to secure British influence and control upon which previous Ameers had been subsidised." When Abdurrahman was recognised by us as Ameer of Afghanistan in 1880 an understanding was entered into that he should follow the advice of the British Government in regard to his external relations. The Ameer has so far acted in conformity with that understanding, and, in order to strengthen his position, the Government of India have decided to give him one lakh of rupees a month. The gifts of arms to the Ameer up to 1882 are described in return No. 18 of 1882. Since then the Ameer has received 1,500 muzzle-loading rifles, 1,000 carbines, 8,274 cartridges for ordnance, 1,778 shells, 3,604 shot, and 996,189 small-arm cartridges.

Mr. COWEN said that the answer just given scarcely coincided with the answer made to a question he put—(cheers)—indeed, it seemed to be a contradiction of it. (Hear, hear.) He wished to ask whether the service the Ameer was to render was stipulated for by anything more than a mere understanding.

Mr. CROSS: The answer I have given to-day is altogether consistent with the answer I gave the other day. There is no reiteration of the understanding which has been entered into with the Ameer: it was entered into in 1880, and it covers all subsequent transactions.

Mr. O'KELLY: Was the understanding evidenced by any written document?

Mr. CROSS: No, sir, it was entered into between our agent and the Ameer himself.

Mr. O'KELLY: Is it a verbal understanding, or one of a more solemn nature?

Mr. S. WORTLEY: Is it in writing?

Mr. ONSLOW: Was the Secretary of State for India consulted in this matter before the Viceroy agreed to give this allowance, and will papers be produced?

Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Are we to understand that there is no written treaty or document?

Mr. CROSS: Notice had better be given of a question.

Mr. O'KELLY: Is the allowance a permanent one, or is it given for a length of time?

Mr. CROSS: I have already stated it is given from month to month.

Mr. ONSLOW: Will papers be produced? If not, I will give notice of a question.

THE CRIMINAL JURISDICTION BILL.

Sir H. WOLFE, in the absence of Mr. Stanhope, asked the Under Secretary of State for India when he proposed to make his promised statement, giving in summary form the views of the Local Governments in India upon the Criminal Jurisdiction Bill.

Mr. CROSS said he was unable to answer now. If the hon. gentleman would repeat the question on Monday, he hoped to be able then to reply.

INDIAN MILITARY EXPENDITURE.

Sir H. WOLFE, in the absence of Mr. Stanhope, asked the Under Secretary of State for India whether it was true that all the remaining proposals of the Government of India and of the Simla Army Commission on the subject of the reduction of military expenditure in India had been rejected by the Secretary of State; and if he would now lay upon the table papers giving a complete explanation of these proposals.

Mr. CROSS: I do not quite understand what the hon. member for Mid Lincoln means by "all the remaining proposals," but the recommendations of the Government of India for the reorganisation of the Indian army in four army corps which has not been adopted, in the opinion of the Secretary of State would involve additional rather than decreased cost. The ultimate saving from the remaining proposals was estimated by the Government of India to amount to 43 lakhs of rupees. Of these the Secretary of State has already sanctioned reductions amounting to 21½ lakhs. Reductions amounting to nine lakhs were disallowed by the Secretary of State, as they would have required very important changes in the organisation of the British Army. With regard to the remaining charges in the staff and other establishments, the Government of India have been invited to make any further recommendations they may consider practicable, consistent with the continuance of the Presidential armies, it being considered that the desired reductions may be effected under the present organisation. The correspondence is not complete, but papers will be presented when it is concluded.

INDIAN OUTPOSTS.

Mr. COWEN asked the Under Secretary of State for India whether all the British troops had been withdrawn from the Pishin Valley, and what was the distance of the farthest British outpost from Candahar.

Mr. ROGERS asked whether the station of Tull-Chotiali, in South Eastern Afghanistan, had not been found very unhealthy; whether sickness and other privations endured by the native regiments stationed there, as also in the outposts in the Pishin Valley, had caused much dissatisfaction among the native troops; could any prospect be held out of these Afghan stations being abandoned; and could the medical returns from all the trans-Indus stations, including Quetta, up to some very recent date, be laid upon the table?

Mr. CROSS: There are no English troops in the Pishin Valley, but there are two detachments of native troops at the outposts of Gulistan and Khush-dil-Khan-ku-Killa. The former post is about 105 miles from Candahar; the latter about 110. In answer to the hon. member for Southwark, I have to say that no report has been received of any special sickness at Tull-Chotiali. The latest returns, of June 1 last, show that of the garrison of 520 men present, 22 were sick. There is no reason to suppose there is any dissatisfaction among the small detachments in the Pishin Valley, or any cause for dissatisfaction. There is no intention of withdrawing those troops from these outposts. The latest complete sanitary returns of the army in India are for 1881. The latest monthly return for June, 1883, shows that of the 3,429 European troops in the trans-Indus stations, there were 221 sick, and of the 15,329 native troops, there were 491 sick on the 1st of that month.

THE MAHARAJAH DHULEEP SINGH.

Mr. ONSLOW said he had received a letter from the Prime Minister asking him not to put the question of which he had given notice respecting the visit of the Maharajah Dhuleep Singh to India. He hoped the right hon. gentleman would allow him time to consider whether it would not be in the interest of India that he should put the question.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY, AUGUST 20.

THE LATE MAHARAJAH OF TANJORE.

Mr. A. O'CONNOR asked the Under Secretary of State for India whether it was a fact that Serbojee Rajah, of the Palace, Tanjore, was adopted by the senior Ranees, and the other Ranees of the late Maharajah of Tanjore; whether the obsequial rites of the late Maharajah were performed by Serbojee Rajah, with the sanction and in the presence of Mr. Forbes, the then Resident of Tanjore; whether, among the Hindoos, and especially the Mahrattas, the authority of the husband was necessary for legalising an adoption by the widow; whether the High Court of Madras in May, 1865, confirming a judgment in the District Courts, admitted the status of Serbojee Rajah, as the adopted son of the late Maharajah of Tanjore; whether the application by all the fifteen Ranees, dated December 12, 1855, the petitions, and mahazernames from the merchants and inhabitants of Tanjore, and the memorials of Serbojee Rajah through his counsel, Mr. Kavanagh, proving the claims of Serbojee to the position and dignity of his adoptive father, the late Maharajah, had been summarily rejected by the Government; and whether at the present moment Serbojee Rajah was living at Tanjore unprovided for and totally depending upon the charity of friends.

Mr. CROSS: Nearly eight years after the death of the Rajah of Tanjore and the lapse of that State to the Government, the senior Ranees wished to adopt Serbojee Rajah as her heir; but Government refused to recognise any adoption, so far as claims to succession to State property were concerned. A nephew performed the funeral ceremonies of the late Rajah in the presence of the Resident; but it is not known who this nephew was. Nothing is known at the India Office of the judgment of the High Court in May, 1865. The various memorials presented soon after the lapse of the State to Government were fully considered and rejected, as was also Mr. Kavanagh's recent memorial. Serbojee's name cannot be traced in the list of Tanjore pensioners, and nothing is known at the India Office as to his pecuniary means.

INDIAN CRIMINAL JURISDICTION BILL.

Mr. HOPWOOD, for Mr. Agnew, asked the Under Secretary of State for India whether the recent publication in the Times of the minutes or report by certain Judges of the Calcutta High Court on the Jurisdiction Bill was a premature and unauthorised publication; and whether, seeing the report in question had been put before the public, he would also lay before the public the minutes or reports on the same subject that had been recorded by the Bombay and Madras High Courts, in order that comparison might be made with the report of the Calcutta Judges.

Mr. CROSS: Strictly speaking, it may perhaps be said that the publication of the report referred to by my hon. friend is irregular and premature, but it is really not a matter of much moment. The reports of the High Courts of Madras and Bombay will be laid on the table with the other reports of the local Governments.

HERR SILBINGER AND THE MAHARAJAH OF JEYPORE.

Mr. ONSLOW asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether it was true that the Austro-Hungarian Government had addressed an elaborate remonstrance to Her Majesty's Government in regard to the case of Herr Silbinger, an Austrian subject, versus the Maharajah of Jeypore, showing that the alleged arbitration (on which Her Majesty's Government had relied in former communications on the subject with the Austro-Hungarian Government) had been a mere burlesque of justice; whether it was true that Her Majesty's Government had not attempted to meet the proofs offered by the Austro-Hungarian Government, but had simply declined to reopen the question; and whether the papers on the subject could be laid before Parliament.

Mr. CROSS: It is the case that in May last the Austrian Government, through their representative in London, requested a further consideration of Herr Silbinger's claim, enclosing certain documents in support of their application. The matter was again fully considered by the Secretary of State in Council, with the result that there appeared no ground for reopening here a question on which the Government of India had more than once expressed a very decided view. The further papers submitted have, however, been forwarded to that Government. An intimation to the foregoing effect has, I believe, been made to the Austrian Ambassador, who, it is right I should mention, was informed in some detail in March, 1881, of the grounds of the decision arrived at by the Indian Government in the matter.

THE INDIAN BUDGET.

Sir S. NORTHCOTE inquired whether the Indian Budget would be taken to-night.

Mr. CROSS replied that it was not on to-night's paper. (An Hon. Member—Oh, yes it is.) However, it would not be taken to-night.

Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked if there was any precedent for the course which had been taken with regard to the Indian Budget. It was understood that it should be taken to-day, and on Saturday the Prime Minister himself distinctly said it would. Great inconvenience was caused by the change being made without notice.

Mr. GLADSTONE very much regretted that by an inadvertence the Indian Budget appeared on the orders for to-night. He must remind the hon. member that it was understood that everything he had said on the subject of taking the Indian Budget to-night was subject to the paramount consideration of Supply.

Mr. ONSLOW suggested that in consequence of the pressure of business the Under Secretary might save time by publishing his statement in the papers. (Hear, hear.)

SPECIAL POLICE-TAX, INDIA.

Mr. MOLLOY asked the Under Secretary of State for India whether he would inquire into the truth of certain statements in the Madras Standard, dated June last, as to the method of levying a special police-tax which had been imposed on the inhabitants of the town of Salem in consequence of a riot which occurred there—viz. "that the tax is fixed in accordance to the will and caprice of a revenue officer, and that the collector simply confirms the assessment;" and, if this was a true statement, whether he would take steps to relieve these people from undue taxation.

Mr. CROSS: The special police-tax to which the hon. member for Queen's County refers, is levied on the inhabitants of Salem under Madras Act III. of 1882, which corresponds with the law in other parts of India. The act provides that "the magistrate of the district after inquiry, if necessary, shall assess the proportion in which the amount is to be paid by the inhabitants according to his judgment of their respective means." The collector of Salem is responsible to the Government of Madras for the manner in which he discharges the duties imposed upon him under the Act; and the Secretary of State sees no reason to interfere.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY, AUGUST 21.

ARMY AND INDIAN MEDICAL OFFICERS.

Mr. ACLAND asked the Secretary of State for War what was the reason of the distinction between candidates and commissions in Her Majesty's Army Medical Department and candidates for commissions in Her Majesty's Indian Medical Service with regard to the marks gained by them at Netley, which in the case of the candidates for the Indian Medical Service were counted, and in that of the candidates for the Army Medical Department were not counted, in the totals which determine in each case respectively their order of merit; and whether it was intended to maintain that distinction.

The Marquis of HARTINGTON: The examination at the conclusion of the Netley course is, in the case of Army Medical candidates, a pass examination merely, their relative precedence having been settled at the entrance examination. With the Indian candidates, on the contrary, the Netley course is competitive and aids in determining the position during subsequent service. The system for the British officers was deliberately adopted, after very full inquiry, by a Committee appointed to consider the causes of the unsatisfactory supply of candidates for the Army Medical Service, which took evidence on this particular point.

INDIAN RAILWAYS.

Mr. SUMMERS asked the Under Secretary of State for India whether it was true, as stated by Mr. A. K. Connel, in his work on the "Economic Revolution of India," that interest charges for guaranteed and State railways, paid out of the ordinary revenue, amounted in 1881-82 to over £32,000,000 and to over £34,000,000 if loss by exchange be taken into account; and whether, in view of those two items, loss by exchange and past interest charges, the Indian railways earned 5½ per cent. on the whole capital outlay.

Mr. CROSS: Up to the 30th of June, 1882, the amount advanced to the guaranteed railway companies (omitting the East Indian) was £25,349,000, and the Government shares of surplus receipts amounted to £1,697,000, giving an excess of £23,647,000. When the East Indian Railway was purchased, the guaranteed interest advanced amounted to £4,505,000. The surplus profits received by Government have amounted to £6,528,000, or £2,818,000 in excess of the amount advanced it as a guaranteed line. The total sum advanced may, therefore, be put at £21,629,000. If loss by exchange on past transactions be added, the amount will no doubt be greater. The capital cost of all the lines open to traffic on the 31st of December, 1882, was about 143 crores—the net revenue was 78 lakhs—or 5·97 per cent. If the capital cost be raised by the addition of the interest advanced to (say) 167 crores, the net revenue was 4·6 per cent.

THE MAHARAJAH DULEEP SINGH.

Mr. OSNOW asked the First Lord of the Treasury whether there was any truth in the report that the Maharajah Duleep Singh had postponed his visit to India; if so, for how long; and whether Her Majesty's Government intended to grant him a further sum of money out of the revenues of India.

Mr. GLADSTONE: No communication has been received from the Maharajah with regard to the postponement of his journey to India. When, some time ago, a desire to make that journey was expressed, the Maharajah was informed by my noble friend the Secretary of State for War, who was then Secretary of State for India, that he would have to conform with the instructions of the Viceroy which might be given him there with respect to his journey. No intention has been formed or expressed by Her Majesty's Government of making an increased money grant to the Maharajah. I may say with respect to this question of the journey, and what may grow out of it, that it has recently been referred to the Government of India.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THIS DAY.

MR. ILBERT'S BILL.

Mr. STANHOPE asked if the Government would lay dummy copies of the opinions of the local Governments in India with respect to Mr. Ilbert's Bill on the table during the present session, so that they might be printed during the recess.

Mr. GLADSTONE said the request appeared to be a reasonable one, and, so far as he could tell at present, it ought to be granted.

THE INDIAN BUDGET.

In the House of Commons this afternoon, on the order for going into committee on the East Indian Revenue Accounts,

Mr. J. CROSS, rising amidst cheers from a very small House, said he had at last, after long waiting, an opportunity of trying to explain the position of the finances of our East Indian Empire. If he had to deal only with taxation, his task would be simple; but these accounts comprised not only the ordinary finance arrangements of an empire of 250,000,000 population, but also the provincial, and part of the local finance of 600,000 towns and villages, and had reference, moreover, to vast schemes of irrigation, navigation, and railway communication. The accounts presented to the House related to the finances of three years. There were the closed accounts of 1881-82, the revised estimates of 1882-83. In the first of these three years the gross receipts were £73,700,000, and expenditure from revenue £71,100,000, leaving a surplus of £2,600,000. Besides that, the provincial Governments had saved from their allotments £1,500,000, so that, altogether, the unspent money of the year amounted to £4,100,000. The actual expenditure was £69,600,000, against £75,900,000 in 1880-81, or a reduction of gross expenditure by £6,300,000. It should be explained that 1880-81 was the last and heaviest year of the Afghan war; and 1881-82 was upon the whole the most prosperous financial year that India had hitherto enjoyed. The principal items of receipts were land tax, salt tax, stamps, excise, provincial revenue, Customs, assessed taxes, and registration; and from those eight sources there were received, in 1881-82, a total of £42,200,000. Deducting the amount of £22,000,000 realised from the land tax, which might be regarded as rent rather than taxation, the whole of the taxation of British India was £20,200,000, or about one rupee per head of the population. The favourable results of the year enabled the Government to relax restrictions which had been placed upon local and provincial expenditure during the time that war, famine, and less by exchange pressed so heavily upon Indian finance; also, to return to provincial Governments £670,000 which had been held in suspense; also to reduce the salt tax by 25 per cent., and to abolish Customs duties on all articles except liquors. Those remissions were equivalent to leaving £2,800,000 in the pockets of the people. In the year 1882-83 the gross revenue was estimated at £67,900,000; and the expenditure at £67,700,000, including the unexpected item of £1,325,000 for the Egyptian war, leaving a surplus of £224,000. But this year, unlike 1881-82, the provincial Governments had expended from their balances £1,500,000, so that the total expenditure of the year was £69,200,000, as against £69,600,000 in the previous year. That year began also with the allocation of £1,500,000 as a famine insurance fund, out of which £25,000 was spent in actual famine relief, £104,000 in protective works, and £1,330,000 in the reduction of debt. The total amount raised under the eight heads of taxation was £39,600,000, of which the land tax produced £21,700,000, leaving the general taxation of the year at £17,900,000, or about 14½ annas per head of the population. As to the coming year, 1883-84, the revenue was estimated in March last to be £67,300,000, and the expenditure £66,800,000, leaving a surplus of between £400,000 and £500,000. Then, again, as in the past year, the local Governments proposed to expend from their balances £1,500,000, making a gross expenditure of £68,300,000, which was £905,000 less than last year. There was also laid aside for famine relief £150,000, of which it was hoped not more than £12,000 had been spent on famine relief, the rest being devoted to protective works and reduction of debt. The receipts were estimated at £39,700,000, and excluding the land revenue of £22,000,000, taxation was estimated to produce £17,964,000, which was a slight increase on the previous year, and was equivalent to 14½ annas per head of the population. In summing up this general statement for the three years, he would add that the accounts for 1882-83 were becoming still more favourable than appeared from the revised estimate, and the closed accounts would show a surplus of £750,000 instead of £224,000. The estimated surplus of £457,000 for 1883-84 would in all probability, should no famine occur, turn out to be a million additional, but it was impossible to make an exact forecast until the rains were over, and they could tell whether or not the country was to be afflicted by famine. Statements were often made that we were grudging some seventy millions a year of taxation out of the people of India. He deprecated such alarming and exaggerated notions, and proceeded to give the details of estimated revenue for 1883-84, as follows:—Opium, £9,200,000; tributes from native States, £700,000; forest receipts, £930,000; post office, telegraphs, &c., £1,670,000; civil departments, including court fees, and education contributions, £14,000,000; interest on local loans, receipts in aid of superannuation and miscellaneous credits, £1,200,000; army receipts, sales of stores, &c., £866,000; and revenue from public works, £11,403,000. The total was £27,513,000.

which added to £39,700,000 raised by taxation, made the gross revenue £57,204,000. If Her Majesty's Government owned the whole of the land in the United Kingdom and let it out and received rent for it, and if they also included in the revenue the receipts from railway, court fees, waterworks, and canals, they would seem to be grinding a dreadful amount of taxation out of the people of England; but it would be just as reasonable to call those items taxation in England as it was to call them taxation in India. (Hear, hear). In explanation of the "dreary details" of the accounts hon. members had been furnished with a printed statement, and he would, therefore, only make a running comment, on the principal points. He had referred to the remissions of the taxation which had been made. The Government were anxious to follow them up by removing the export duty on rice, which produced about £700,000, but the large increase in army pension charges prevented them doing so this year. The revenue from Excise grew at a moderate rate, which showed that the Blue Ribbon Army had not got possession of the country (hear, hear); but, of course, that item depended very much on the general prosperity of the country, and as India was very prosperous now, he anticipated the estimated receipts from Excise would show a good increase. Forests were a steadily growing source of revenue, and the net receipts from them were more now than the gross receipts a few years ago. He expected good results from the education in French forestry of young men appointed to this branch of the Indian Civil Service. The extent of land under forestry in India was now thirty-three square miles. The post office and telegraphic service was being rapidly extended. There were now 4,800 post offices and 7,000 letter boxes, and 52,000 miles of telegraph wires covered 22,000 miles of country. The army expenditure was not an easy subject to touch. The gross total for the year 1881-83 was £17,434,000. For the year 1883-84, the estimate was £16,000,000. These sums compared favourably with the two previous years, in which the charges were £28,000,000 and £19,000,000 respectively—those two years being the two years of the Afghan war. Of the £17,000,000 spent last year £500,000 was contributed by this country. Deducting the contributions from this country, the cost of the Indian Government for the year 1882-83 was £15,900,000, against a net cost of £15,000,000 in the previous year, and £23,800,000 in 1881. This year they expected the net cost would be £15,198,000. He thought that it was useless to expect that the non-effective charges of the Indian Army would be less than £3,100,000 a year. The estimated cost of the army this year was certainly less than for the last six or seven years, and had it not been for the increased amount for pensions the reduction would have been much more favourable. With regard to public works, which was a most important question in India, the total expenditure on both branches, productive and ordinary, in the three years ending March, 1884, was £29,036,000, towards which there had been provided by loans £9,400,000, the rest having been accomplished out of revenue. (Cheers.) In the previous three years the amount expended was £28,482,000, against which there was provided by loans and balances £14,400,000. In the last three years it would be seen that there had been spent £554,000 more on public works of all sorts; but they had borrowed, and used for balances, £5,000,000 less. (Cheers.) This was the best kind of expenditure the Government could undertake. It was impossible, however, to confine the Indian Government within a certain amount of expenditure every year; and in regarding the expenditure they must look at the advantages gained, and at the conveniences given, rather than at the results in cash. The hon. gentlemen opposite (Mr. Stanhope) seemed to think these were luxuries that India could not afford; but there he was at issue with the hon. gentleman. Taken as a whole, the railways of India were on the high road to prosperity, and if they were taken at 3½ per cent., they would have contributed to the revenue no less than two millions sterling. The financial results of the irrigation works were not nearly so good as those of the railways, and that was accounted for by the fact that a great many of the works had been executed with much regard to economy and without due consideration. There was still a large field for railways in India, for in one part there were 160,000 square miles with 20 millions of people, without a railway through it; and that part contained some of the most fertile land, where famine was never known. It was for the House of Commons to decide whether India should be encouraged, within moderate limits, to increase railway accommodation, and in that way stimulate her productive powers, and lessen the sufferings of the people in time of famine. All India asked was to be allowed to develop her resources, and he would like to share the responsibility of refusing her that request. During the present year the State would spend £4,400,000 in railways, while private companies would spend £1,600,000 more, so that at least £6,000,000 sterling would be spent this year. The total debt, including every liability and guarantee on account of public works, was £229,000,000, against which they had public works which paid good interest on £163,000,000, leaving an uncovered debt of £66,000,000—not an excessive amount for a country of 200 millions of people; with its trade and commerce rapidly increasing. After expressing his regret at the retirement from the Indian service of Sir E. Baring and Sir L. Malet, Mr. Cross said, in conclusion, he must observe that much depended on the terms on which we lived with our neighbours, and it had been the endeavour of the Government of Lord Ripon to cultivate good relations with the Ameer of Afghanistan. Our own relations with him were those of cordial concord, and he believed that in his own ability to defend his State lay our best safeguard from frontier complications. The cordial friendship of the Ameer was far less costly than his shyness, and the Government of India had thought it right to enable him to maintain his position, even at some cost to themselves. (Cheers).

Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT moved as an amendment to going into committee—"That the proposed changes in the Indian criminal law are uncalled for and impolitic, and that a charge upon the Indian revenues for the payment of native magistrates, having criminal jurisdiction over Europeans, as provided by the Criminal Procedure Amendment Bill is inexpedient." He complained of the contemptuous treatment which the important statement of the Indian Budget had received at the hands of her Majesty's Government; for it had been put off from day to day, and now was brought forward at a time when there were not a score of members in the House. He then proceeded to condemn the proposals of the Ilbert Bill, and said there had been practically no call for the measure, which was most dangerous and inexpedient. It had aroused race antagonism in India, and the opposition of Europeans to an unprecedented extent, and, in his opinion, it was most unwise on the part of the Government to allow such a thing to be done. The hon. gentleman, however, did not move his amendment.

Mr. A. ARNOLD moved the following amendment: "That, in the interests of India and of the United Kingdom, it is desirable that India should not bear the charge of the Consular and Agency expenditure on the Persian Gulf and upon the Tigris and Euphrates, and that the concerns of British trade and commerce in Western Asia should be in the hands of officers more completely responsible to the Home Government."

Mr. E. STANHOPE protested against the late period of the Session at which the Indian Budget was submitted to Parliament. The effect of the new Procedure Rules had been to exclude the discussion of Indian subjects on the motion to go into Committee of Supply. The result would be that next year Indian topics would be discussed on the Address in reply to the speech from the Throne, unless the Prime Minister would promise an opportunity early in the Session of having such a debate. The present debate had been largely anticipated by the discussion on the motion in favour of the reduction of Indian expenditure. Their attention now ought to be confined to the ordinary income and expenditure of India, and he submitted that this expenditure had increased by 3½ millions. He advocated public works in India, but they should not be pushed on in advance of the material progress of the country. What ought to be done was to lay down a scheme for the construction of public works over a number of years, which scheme should not be departed from. As to the Ilbert Bill, he contended that everybody who knew anything about the matter was against it. This was a case of experience against sentiment, and the question was whether experience was to go for nothing. None of the Local Governments were in favour of the measure, as there was no inconvenience felt which it would remedy. The only argument in favour of the Bill was that it would abolish all race distinctions, and the simple answer to that was that it could not be done.

After a somewhat lengthy discussion, in which Mr. W. Fowler, Lord G. Hamilton, and Mr. S. Smith took part, Sir G. Campbell moved the adjournment of the debate, which motion, after some objections on the part of several hon. gentlemen, was ultimately agreed to, and the debate stands adjourned until to-morrow (Thursday).

THE ARMY MEDICAL SCHOOL, NETLEY.—The summer session of the Army Medical School terminated on the 6th inst., when the prizes in the gift of the senate were handed to the successful competitors. A noticeable feature of the present session has been that all the prizes, with a single exception, have been carried off by one of the surgeons on probation, Mr. J. M. Young, of the Indian Medical Service, who obtained the Martin Memorial gold medal, the Herbert prize, the Parkes memorial (gold medal and a sum of £100), and the Montefiore prize, which consists of a gold medal and a sum of twenty guineas.

We find the names of two Bombay men in the list of candidates who recently passed in the open competition for the Indian Civil Service, Mr. Sidney St. John Westlake, son of Mr. J. Westlake, exchange broker, and Mr. Reginald Pocock Barrow, son of Mr. H. W. Barrow, Secretary to the Municipality. Mr. Westlake who occupies the eighth place on the list, wanting, we believe, direct from Cheltenham College; Mr. Barrow was educated privately at Plymouth, and coached by Mr. Wren.

THE CAUCUS ON THE ILBERT BILL.

It is really exceedingly hard on the Englishmen and Englishwomen of India, when they are engaged in a death-struggle in defence of dearly-cherished rights—when they have shown the people of England, beyond all manner of doubt, that they contemplate the loss of those rights with the utmost alarm—and when they already have opposed to them all the immense influence of a powerful despotic Government like that of the Viceroy—it really is exceedingly hard on them that their persecutors should be reinforced by all the wire-pulling machinery of a great political organisation like that of Mr. Chamberlain's "National Liberal Club." If the Anglo-Indians had themselves appealed to any English political party, there would have been some excuse for this very unfair and cowardly treatment. But it is a fact, undeniable and undenied, that the utmost care has been taken to keep the movement against the Ilbert Bill entirely free from anything like a party complexion; so much so, that the only Parliamentary assistance accepted by the Anglo-Indian Association, on the occasion of their recent deputation to the Secretary of State, was that of an honourable and conscientious member of the party to which the Viceroy himself belongs. It is well known that several of the most prominent members of the London Committee have hitherto been stanch Liberals in politics. At least three have been members of the Reform Club. And yet this Association, and the cause it has advocated with admitted moderation and fairness, have not only been assailed by Mr. Bright and the Radicals with the utmost ferocity and with shameless misrepresentations, but have also been marked out for the vindictive malevolence of that secret organisation with which Mr. Chamberlain has unhappily succeeded in terrorising the more respectable sections of the Liberal party. When the resolution in favour of the Ilbert Bill was passed by that sapient body, the Radical 800 of Birmingham, we mentioned the probability that the mot d'ordre had been passed round; and the subsequent action of the Radical "Sunday" clubs—who appear to have elevated Mr. Lal Mohun Ghose to a par with Mr. Bradlaugh—and of the Eleusis Club and other societies of that class, has confirmed that impression. And now, the Northern Echo has let in a little light on the tactics by which Lord Ripon obtains support for his policy of "crushing the Anglo-Indians." That exceedingly zealous Radical organ prints, in its issue of Thursday last, an extract from a letter addressed by the Secretary of Mr. Chamberlain's "National Liberal Club" to a gentleman who is described—with the mysterious vagueness characteristic of the doings of a Vehmgericht—as a "Provincial Secretary." This letter from headquarters runs as follows:—

"There is one aspect of the matter which has not, I think, received the consideration which is its due. That is, that the agitation against the Ilbert Bill is really a deliberate attempt to thwart the well-considered and repeatedly affirmed policy of the British Parliament. The two Houses of Parliament have again and again affirmed that special means shall be taken to give duly-qualified Indians a share in the administration of the affairs of their own country. Such a course is so consonant with Liberal practice that I need not quote anything as evidence on this point. But I may point out that Lord Cranbrook, writing to Lord Lytton in 1878, said, 'The broad policy laid down by Parliament so long ago as 1833, that no native shall by reason of his religion, place of birth, or colour, be disabled from holding any office.' Her Majesty's gracious proclamation of 1858 announced her will that as far as may be 'our subjects, of whatever race or creed, be impartially admitted to offices in our service, the duties of which they may be qualified by their education, ability, and integrity duly to discharge. Lord Ripon, on the initiation of an experienced Indian official (Sir Ashley Eden, K.C.S.I. late Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal), with the sanction of the Secretary of State for India, prepared a moderate and cautious measure to give effect to this policy. As one consequence of the Bill introduced by Mr. Ilbert becoming law would be to elevate our fellow-subjects in India in some things to an equality with ourselves, all the privileged classes in India have joined in denouncing the measure, and have uttered predictions of the terrible woe which would follow its adoption. These predictions are of the kind with which we are familiar in this country when we are told of every reform that is introduced."

Here we get an exact repetition of the worst points of Mr. Bright's speech, sent round to men who are confessedly ignorant of the subject, with all the authority attaching to a missive from the "inner circle" of the organisation. The imputation on the motives of "the privileged classes of India" is precisely that which wrung from poor conscientious Mr. Markby his honest disclaimer, in the Pall Mall Gazette, of any participation in the base false-witness borne by his allies against honest men who are striving to prevent a cruel wrong. Here, too, we get once more the monstrous pretence that the Ilbert Bill will "give duly-qualified Indians a share in the administration of the affairs of their own country"—a pretence that, of course, could not possibly be publicly put forward for a moment by Lord Ripon himself or any of his responsible supporters. Such statements as these may possibly serve their turn with the ignorant "Hundreds" of the Radical party and their "Provincial Secretaries." They may even succeed—such appears to be the basilisk power of the Caucus over the present Ministry—in enabling Lord Ripon to wreak his vengeance on his fellow-countrymen in India. But they will remain as a lasting stain on the good fame of the Radical party. The remembrance of them cannot but rankle in the hearts of Anglo-Indians as that of a cruel wrong inflicted at a dark and critical moment of trouble and danger. And their open, palpable untruthfulness will justify—and will also, alas, embitter—that resolute determination to obtain a reversal of the unjust judgment which is certain to follow any attempt on Lord Ripon's part to avail himself of an advantage so unfairly gained.

THE POLICY OF PLUNDER IN BENGAL.

We are glad to see that the Zemindars of the Dacca division have come forward to protest against Lord Ripon's revolutionary land policy, that threatens to let loose a flood of litigation on Bengal, and to set every man's hand against his neighbour's in that hitherto prosperous province. For the circumstances of Eastern Bengal are such as to render the socialistic policy of the present Government particularly inappropriate, and particularly displeasing to all classes of the population. Until the appearance of Lord Ripon's ill-advised measure, the peasantry there were admittedly contented and happy. There was not even the slightest semblance of any widespread hostility between landlords and tenants; on the contrary, the two classes merged very gradually into each other, and both were well-to-do. Of course, if Lord Ripon insists on letting loose the agitators of the Indian Association among the Dacca ryots, the latter are but human; and doubtless we shall henceforward have a plentiful crop of agrarian grievances and agrarian disturbances in every district. But—is this statesmanship?

HOME NEWS.

THE SILVER MARKET AND THE EASTERN EXCHANGES.—

On Thursday Indian telegraphic transfer rates were again higher at 1s. 7 15-32d., and bar silver rose to 50½d. per ounce. A small amount of business was done, but there were no supplies on hand worth mentioning. Mexican dollars followed the advance in the price of silver bars, and were quoted at 49 3-16d. There was, however, no business in them. The Hong-Kong rate of exchange was somewhat firmer at 3s. 8½d. the Shanghai quotation remaining at 5s. 0¾d. The market for Rupee Paper was rather quiet, the Four-and-a-Half and Four per Cents. being quoted at 83½ to 83¾, and 80½ to 80¾ respectively.

PRODUCE MARKETS.—Messrs. W. J. and H. Thompson state that the markets remain in the dull and unsatisfactory state so long advised, quotations in several cases showing weakness. The supplies of foreign coffee continue large and in excess of requirements. Common qualities, including Guatemala, have sold at irregular prices. On Thursday, however, Costa Rica went better than expected. Most of the East India at public sale has been withdrawn. Plantation Ceylon barely supports last week's quotations, excepting for the fine and bold sorts. Estimates of the Rio and Santos crop are about 1¼ million bags below the previous season's. A few transactions have occurred in the latter descriptions on previous low terms, and two floating cargoes of Rio sold since the 9th inst. Cocoa is dull and lower. With further arrivals of tea from Foochow and unusually large public sales prices have touched 7½d. per lb. for common grades of red leaf Congou. There is a limited business by private contract. Finest Indian of the new crop meets a strong demand at firm rates. Other descriptions are quiet. Nothing of interest has transpired in the sugar market, which is exceedingly flat. Crystallised Demerara has sold rather under the highest rates last quoted. Refined has in some instances declined, especially dry goods. Beet for delivery offers under the low rates current at this time last year. The consumption of sugar in the United Kingdom makes rapid progress, the total deliveries from the four chief ports exceeding the previous season's by about 55,000 tons, and the stock according to the latest return was 3,000 tons less. The recent improvement in spice is not supported, and the extremely high value of pepper at length stops the demand. Zanzibar cloves show a fall of ¼d. to ¾d. per lb. when sold. Cinchona is lower and the supply large.

TEA.—Indian.—Considerable supplies of the new crop have come to hand, and the fine invoices command a ready sale, quotations ranging up to 3s. 6d. per lb. The choicest yet seen are from the Darjeeling Company's and the Luckimpore Company's gardens, which have realised averages of about 2s. 1d. per lb. Demand is slack for inferior descriptions at prices favouring buyers. The auctions have comprised 13,000 packages. From Messrs. Hawes and Hertz's report.—Ceylon has been in larger assortment, and the quality for the most part being good, they have continued in good favour with buyers, and some high averages have been obtained. A small invoice of Galliboide realised 1s. 9½d. all round, and several other of the better plantations, such as Dolosbage, Sembawattie, &c., have averaged over 1s. 6d. per lb. Java.—A good business has been done during the fortnight, 2,031 packages having been disposed of by auction, and about 600 by private sale, ex the Bulimba and Roma. Some of the best gardens such as Parakansalak, Sinagar, and Tijisalak, sent teas of excellent quality, which sold freely at fairly steady prices, especially the first mentioned teas which much resembled Ceylon growths in character. We understand that many of these better liquoring teas go direct into consumption with little or no mixing with Indian sorts, are much appreciated by the consumers, and with present prices must be very remunerative to the trade.

THE NEW INDIAN LOAN.—Advices have been received in London from Calcutta giving the result of the allotment of the New Four per Cent. Loan for 2½ crores of rupees. Tenders at 98 9-16 will receive about two-thirds of the amount applied for, applications at 98½ receiving in full.

THE INDIAN CRIMINAL PROCEDURE BILL.—The National Representative Committee of the Indian Society have addressed a memorial to Lord Kimberley, drawing his attention to the resolutions adopted at the general meeting of the Indian Society in London on April 28, and setting forth considerations in favour of Mr. Ilbert's Bill.

COUNCIL DRAFTS ON INDIA.—The tenders for Rs. 25,000,000 in bills and telegraphic transfers on India were received on Wednesday at the Bank of England. The amounts allotted were:—In bills on Calcutta, Rs. 1,30,000, at an average rate of 1s. 7½d.; Bombay, Rs. 20,000, at an average rate of 1s. 7½d.; and Madras, Rs. 15,000, at an average rate of 1s. 7½d.; in telegraphic transfers on Calcutta, Rs. 19,25,000, at an average rate of 1s. 7½d.; and on Bombay, Rs. 10,25,000, at an average rate of 1s. 7½d.—or a total allotment of Rs. 31,15,000. Tenders for bills on all Presidencies at 1s. 7-16d. and above will receive in full, and for telegraphic transfers on Calcutta and Bombay at 1s. 7-15-32d. about 35 per cent., and above in full. In addition to the above the Council sold two lakhs of transfers on Calcutta and three-and-a-half lakhs on Bombay at 1s. 7-17-32d. in each case. From April 1 to August 14 the total amount of remittances sold had reached Rs. 7,33,71,350 and realised £5,935,738.

THE THAKORE SAHIB OF MORVI.—The Thakore Sahib of Morvi, who has taken up his residence for a time in this country, is the chief of a small state in the political agency of Kattiawar. The name of the present Thakore is Waghi, and he was born in or about the year 1850. His family is by race of the Jareja Rajputs, and their tradition is that they are the elder branch of the ruling house in Cutch. The story goes that the founder of the Morvi family was the heir of the Rao of Cutch in the latter part of the 17th century, but that he had to flee in consequence of the successful plot of an uncle, who murdered his brother, the reigning Rao, and usurped the ruling authority. The true heir fled to Morvi, where he succeeded in founding an independent authority on a small scale of his own. The Morvi family recognised in the year 1807 the same obligations towards the supreme Government as the other chiefs of Kattiawar, and agreed to pay to us an annual tribute of nearly £5,000; the Thakore also pays a sum of money to the Gaikwar of Baroda. The State, though small, is extremely rich, as may be judged from the fact that the revenue of less than 100,000 subjects is nearly £80,000 a year. A great portion of this is, no doubt, derived from the trade of the small port of Jangli, which has always been greatly coveted by the more powerful neighbour, the Rao of Cutch. The Thakore's army is not of large dimensions, numbering not more than 386 men; but considerable attention and sums of money have been devoted to the more necessary and laudable object of education. Twenty-seven schools have been opened in different parts of the State, and it is declared that more than a thousand scholars duly attend them. Morvi ranks as a second-class State, but its ruler has the right of inflicting capital punishment on his own subjects. The Thakore Sahib, however, is more of a wealthy noble than a political personage.

H.M.'s TROOPSHIPS.—The Indian troopship Euphrates, which will leave Portsmouth on the 8th prox. with troops for Bombay, made a full-power trial of her engines on Friday morning after repairs. The trial was very satisfactory, the mean power indicated with an average of fifty-five pounds of steam, and forty-five revolutions being 3,083½ horses. The mean speed measured by log was twelve knots an hour.

OBITUARY.—Major-General Montagu Thomas Ffrench, of the Madras Staff Corps, late of the 34th Madras Native Infantry, died on Saturday, at his residence in Bardley-crescent, Earl's court, Kensington, aged sixty-two. The gallant officer entered the Army in 1837, and obtained a lieutenancy in 1839, in which year he served with the field force in Kurnool. He was promoted to the rank of captain in 1854, was present at the action of Ebrospore, and from 1857 to 1859 he was employed in Bengal. In 1858 he took part in the engagements at Suhar, Shahabad, and Moorpoor Shahabad, for which services he was awarded a medal. His subsequent promotions were:—Major and Lieutenant-Colonel in 1866, Brevet Colonel in 1868, and Major-General in 1881.

ARRIVAL OF AN INDIAN MAIL.—The Peninsular and Oriental Steamship Company's mail packet Malwa, Captain Loggin, from Bombay, July 24; Aden, August 1; Suez, 6; Port Said, 8; Malta, 12; and Gibraltar, 16, arrived at Plymouth at 7 a.m. on Monday morning. This vessel usually runs between Bombay, Venice, Trieste, and Brindisi, with overland passengers and mails, but, owing to the quarantine regulations in the East, she was stopped from going her ordinary passage because it was feared that she would have been put in quarantine at Trieste for at least three weeks. She accordingly received instructions to come on to England direct. The vessel was put in quarantine from the time she arrived at Aden until her arrival at Plymouth, where she was granted pratique on the Custom House authorities ascertaining that there was no sickness on board, and had been none during the voyage. Although the vessel was put in quarantine for such a length of time, and the authorities at each place at which the ship touched were very strict, positively refusing to allow any communication with the shore, and she had clean bills of health, the passengers were subjected to a medical examination when they embarked, while military passengers were similarly dealt with by medical officers of the Army before being allowed to pass. The Malwa had 103 passengers on board and four sacks of mails, made up as follows:—One tarred bag from Suez, two sacks from Gibraltar, and one from Malta. Fifty-seven passengers and the mails, which were forwarded to London, were landed at Plymouth. The Malwa left the Sound at 8 a.m. for London. Among the passengers were Major Slesne, Hon. H. E. Dampier, Captain Dent, and the Rev. W. C. Furneaux, from Bombay; Major Turner, from Suez; Major Macpherson, from Malta; Lady Gifford, Colonel Keith, and Captain Hemphill, from Gibraltar.

With Notes and Additions.

* From the Academy, April 28, 1883.

"But the article of the number is one on 'The Kitchen and the Cellar,' a survey of British and Foreign cooking since a lapse of forty years since last the oracle of the Quarterly spoke on the subject. The article discusses what elements of cooking for private households in France we can import with advantage into this country, and finds the Frenchman better understood than our own in the more perfect grilling of the French charcoal fuel, and the cleanliness with which fish, flesh, and fowl are thus grilled, and served with perfectly and separately made sauces. In comparison with the other, the writer considers the universal instruction of red wine for dinner as important for the palate as the amelioration of soups."

From "Our Van," Bailey's Magazine, November, 1877.

"The present number of the Quarterly contains a paper which will most certainly be read with much interest at the present time. The paper, in question, entitled 'Carriages, Roads, and Coaches,' treats (and in a most exhaustive manner, too) of all sorts of conveyances used for business as well as for pleasure, their various shapes and builds, and of the materials of which they are composed. The roads on which we ride and drive are also most elaborately discussed; and the merits and demerits of the wood, granite, asphalt, and macadam most artistically defined. Tramsways, the greatest nuisance (herring, probably, bicycles) to driving and riding, are also fully expatiated upon; harness and other appointments are treated of in their proper places; and the whole concludes with a lengthened dissertation upon coaching, past and present, driving, professional and amateur, the times kept, the financial status of the coaches that are now on the road, a few good hints to coachmen and guards, all which will be found instructive as well as amusing."

PICTURES OF MEN AND MANNERS

TAKEN FROM LIFE BY

Author of the "Indian Muse in English Verse," "Pleasures of Morality," "Wilson Virah," &c. Editor of the "Indian Spectator," Bombay.

"A quaint and undoubtedly clever book from the pen of a native of India. The volume consists of a series of short sketches of scenes and people in Gujarat, which may be regarded as typical of classes of the community, their ways of life and modes of thought. Mr. Malabari's English style is remarkably good, and seldom exhibits any want of ease. His book is of special interest as throwing some light on the real feeling of the natives with regard to their British rulers."—Daily Telegraph.

"The book is clever throughout."—Academy.

THE VOICE OF INDIA, A NEW MAGAZINE INTENDED TO GIVE EXPRESSION TO THE PUBLIC OPINION OF INDIA.

There are in England large classes willing and anxious to do justice to India but they find it very difficult to know how to act. They complain that Indian questions are intricate; that the opinions of official experts are contradictory; and that the people of India are dumb, and do not give expression to their needs. This defect is now desired to be remedied, by publishing monthly in Bombay a magazine somewhat similar in nature to Public Opinion in England, which will provide a compendium of all that is most valuable in the native journals throughout India, on the leading topics of the day. It is hoped that the Voice of India will thus give forth a clear sound, interpreting between the rulers and the ruled, and making known the true wishes and feelings of the Indian people.

The Magazine will advocate no views of its own. It will seek only to reflect with care and accuracy the views set forth in the native press. The Indian people are naturally docile and conservative; and it is believed that the writings thus brought before the English public will be found to be characterised by a knowledge of facts, and generally by practical good sense and moderation. No doubt grievances will from time to time be set forth; but it is a policy of prudence no less than of justice to give these grievances a fair constitutional hearing. Accordingly, it is hoped that this publication will be welcomed by all Members of Parliament desirous of dealing with Indian questions, and that the facts thus brought together in a convenient form will be of value to journalists and other public writers. It is specially desired to bring the Magazine before the public in clubs, reading-rooms, libraries, and institutes throughout England, with a view to promote a sustained and intelligent interest in the welfare of our Indian Empire, comprising as it does 220 millions of our fellow-subjects.

THE NATIVE AGITATION IN CALCUTTA.

MR. SURENDRANATH BANNERJI'S NATIONAL FUND MEETING "TO REFORM THE GOVERNMENT."

THE following is the announcement of Mr. Surendranath Bannerji's "National Fund" meeting (convened by the "Indian Association," of Calcutta, immediately after the release of Mr. Bannerji), which appears in that gentleman's paper, the Bengalee, in explanation of the objects of the National Fund:—

"We are glad to find that the Indian Association has convened a public meeting to be held on Tuesday next at Beadon-street, to take into consideration the means for raising a National Fund, for purposes of constitutional agitation both here and in England. We welcome this movement, this serious effort on the part of the Association, to perform a great public duty, for which there seems to be now such a splendid opportunity. Money forms the sinews of war, and in the earnest and constitutional struggle into which we have entered to reform the government of this country, we require money. The time is most opportune for the inauguration of this movement for the creation of a National Fund. There is a strong feeling throughout the country in favour of it. Politics is simply the science of opportunities, and the political body which has the sagacity to take advantage of opportunities and turn them to the benefit of the country justifies its existence and covers itself with honour. We hope there will be a warm response to the appeal of the Association from all parts of the country, and that the Calcutta meeting will be largely attended by our countrymen, in token of their sympathy with its objects."

THE "REGENERATION OF OUR FALLEN COUNTRY," DATING FROM THE RELEASE OF MR. BANNERJI.

THE Bengalee says:—Meetings expressive of joy at the release of Babu Surendranath Bannerjee have been held in different parts of the country. We have received the following letter from Furreedpur:—

"I have much pleasure in informing you, that another public meeting was held at Furreedpore on the evening of yesterday to congratulate you on your happy release from gaol and to express the sympathy of the Furreedpore public with the work of the Indian Association. Babu Prosono Kumar Sanyal, Pleader, presided. The schoolboys were numerous present with black ribbons on their breast, which they had been wearing since the day of your imprisonment had been announced here, and they joyfully responded to the call of the Secretary of the meeting in throwing off their sign of mourning. The meeting desire me to inform you, that you have by your calm endurance and sufferings risen very high in their estimation, and they hope and trust that ever in your useful career of life you will hold that place in their esteem and regard, which you now so eminently occupy in the country. You will, in fine, also allow me to avail myself of this opportunity to express to you my sincere satisfaction for your late misfortune; for I did and do still reckon your imprisonment as an auspicious event from which, God willing, will date the regeneration of our fallen country."

We have received the following letter from Berhampur:—

"An influential meeting of the inhabitants of Berhampore was held at the premises of the Local Government School on the evening of Wednesday last to express the joy of the people at the release of Babu Surendra Nath Bannerjee from the Presidency gaol, and safe return to his self-imposed task of politically regenerating India. More than 500 people assembled and the leading members of the bar mustered strong. Babu Srinath Pal, a near relative of Maharani Samamoyi, was in the chair. The local band played "God save the Queen."

THE GREAT NATIONAL FUND MEETING.

THE Englishman says of the meeting:—

"A native meeting, chiefly attended by schoolboys, was held this week at which it was resolved to raise a fund for the purpose of agitating native grievances."

We take the following full report from the Indian Mirror:—

A Public Meeting was held on Tuesday evening last at Babu Anath Nath Deb's Bazaar, Beadon-street, "to consider the means for raising a National Fund for purposes of constitutional agitation both here and in England." "The matter," according to the requisition of the Indian Association which called the meeting, was "of the greatest importance, and the sympathy and co-operation of all classes of the community were needed to ensure the complete success of the movement so much needed in the interests of the community."

The meeting was truly representative in its character, for with the exception of, perhaps, one section, Calcutta was represented at the meeting. There were members of the Bar, there were Pleaders, medical men, merchants, traders, Government pensioners, and others. There must have been from eight to ten thousand people present, and the enthusiasm of the meeting was the most marked. As those who had to take a leading part came in one after another, they were vociferously cheered. Delegates from Mofussil towns were present, and one of them, Babu Tarapodo Banerji, the delegate of Krishnagur, gave a donation of hundred rupees at the meeting, and promised a monthly subscription of Rs.5. Numerous telegrams and letters of sympathy received from the Mofussil were read at the meeting. Kumar Mohima Ranjan Roy, the richest Zemindar of Rungpore, sent the following telegram:—

"I feel the raising of a National Fund as indispensably necessary for the furthering the well-being of all India. The meeting has my warm sympathy."

Rajah Surjikanth Acharji, of Mymensing, sent the following telegram:—

"Sympathise with the meeting. Consent to raise fund."

The following telegram was received from the Editor of the Native Opinion of Bombay:—

"The movement of the Indian Association to raise a National Fund for constitutional ventilation in India and England of Indian administrative questions, commands my warmest sympathy, as it ought that of every well-wisher of India. I regard the movement as not a day too soon, and wish it every success."

The following telegram was received from Babu Hem Chunder Boruah, of Gowhaty:—

"We and other educated Natives of Assam have perfect sympathy with the object of the meeting to be held to consider the means for raising a fund for constitutional agitation."

In addition to these, among others, telegrams and letters of sympathy were received from the following places:—Mirut, Ferozepore, Simla, Delhi, Allahabad, Bankipore, Balasore, Munnapore, Burdwan, Dacca, Deoghur, Muttra, Mozufferpore, Lahore, Bogra, Saidpore, Furriddpore, Bhajungbat, Chota, Simlah, Serajunge, &c., &c.

The meeting was in every respect a great success.

The proceedings were opened by the Rev. Dr. K. M. BANNERJI who occupied the chair, and who, in introducing the subject, said: Gentlemen, I have first to mention to you that a great many telegrams and letters have been received, expressing the warmest sympathy with the objects of the meeting; and my friend, the Secretary, will read to you the names of the persons from whom, and the places from which, these communications have been received. All I have to do is to say a few words as to the nature of the "constitutional agitation" which is mentioned in the advertisement, and which you are called upon to join in, and also the object and need of it. Constitutional agitation, as I take it, is another word for lawful efforts for lawfully fulfilling our duties—for doing what either God or man may rightfully expect at our hands. (Cheers.) Gentlemen, never in the history of India has any party, either in England or in this country, denounced such measures of improvement as we have had the mortification to witness within the past few months; and of late years the leaders of the Conservative party have spoken both in Parliament and elsewhere deridingly of those principles of the Indian Government which were enunciated in the Queen's Proclamation, which has since been confirmed and enforced by several Acts of Parliament, and which all Governors-General have uniformly endeavoured to respect. (Loud cheers.) These principles, as I have said, have lately been derided and repudiated in Parliament by the party who, if anything happens to the present Government, will become the rulers of India. This, I say, is a dangerous crisis to which we cannot close our eyes. Gentlemen, it is true that Lord Lytton gagged the Press, but this at least can be said for him that he apologised for it by calling it an irony of fate, that he, a free-born Englishman, should be called upon to pass such an Act as the Vernacular Press Act. At such a crisis, there is a greater need, I say, for such an agitation. We must keep the people of England always on the alert, and always properly and correctly informed as to passing events, so that if the present Government do fail, their successors will have before them a true statement of affairs. This, therefore, is the reason for keeping up an agitation both in India and in England. Generally speaking, agitations are made against Governments to induce them to do something which they will not do; but our agitation has no such object in view. Its more immediate object is to strengthen the hands of the Government. (Cheers.) We fight, gentlemen, under the banners of the Queen, and the conflict must be carried on nobly, lawfully, and honourably. (Loud cheers.) With us there should be no use of vituperation or personality, abuse, or invective, for the constitution does not allow all this. If we desire to carry on a constitutional agitation, we should carry it on in a moral, virtuous, and honest way, as the object we have in view is to strengthen the hands of the Government. Gentlemen, what the present Viceroy is doing is simply to carry out what former Parliaments and Indian Governments have always recognised and advocated, though I must say the times are far from happy when it requires such an agitation as this to strengthen the hands of the Government. There are many Englishmen who are not living and acting up to the traditions of their great name. (Hear, hear.) It is indeed an unhappy thing that what Englishmen should have done for us we should be compelled to have to do for ourselves. Now, I do not believe, I don't mean—in fact, I cannot believe, I cannot mean—that the bulk of Englishmen—the English nation—are knowingly doing this. The fact is that a dozen or so designing men have raised the cry of "fire," and have created a panic, and the cry has been taken up and spread abroad, but they may yet find themselves in a place which they have not calculated upon. Our hope, our desire is that the minds of these panic-stricken sympathisers might be disabused. It is a matter of the greatest surprise that the Conservative party should connect themselves with such a movement as this, for it was a Conservative Governor-General, Viscount Hardinge, who first tried to introduce the principles of self-government into this country, but the times were not ripe for it. I say that the names of men like Hardinge and Robert Peel ought to have been more respected by the successor of the present age than they have been, and what we are going to do is no more than what Hardinge and Peel would have done. The speaker said, in conclusion, that their text should be the Crown, the Constitution, the Law, and the People; and God helping them, he hoped they would succeed. (Loud cheers.)

Mr. ANUNDO MOHUN BOSE read out the names of the different stations in India from where telegrams and letters had been received, sympathising with the objects of the meeting.

BABU SURENDRA NATH BANNERJI then rose amidst loud and prolonged cheers, and said—Gentlemen, I beg to move the first resolution which is as follows:—"That this meeting is of opinion that a National Fund should be raised with a view to secure the political advancement of the country by means of constitutional agitation in India and England, and by other legitimate means, and that the other Provinces be invited to join in the movement." Gentlemen, before I proceed to offer any observations upon this resolution you will permit me for a moment to recur to a thought which is uppermost in my mind, and to give expression to the deep and fervent sense of gratitude which overpowers me at the present moment for the warm sympathy I received in the hour of my distress from all classes and all sections of a great and united nation. (Applause.) I confess I never knew that I occupied such a place in the affections of my countrymen. (Applause.) I never knew that my humble services were viewed with such indulgent consideration by those whose approbation next to the approbation of my own conscience, (applause)—I value as the highest reward of my public life. This expression of sympathy, deep and spontaneous, proceeding from the great heart of the nation, has filled me with an overpowering sense of gratitude, and I trust in God that it shall be the high privilege of my life to be able to devote my body and soul, to consecrate my energies, my time, my resources, my humble talents, my all—(applause)—to the service of my country; and the highest reward that I shall expect will be the consolation vouchsafed to me in the supreme hour of my life, that I have not lived in vain, but that I have been of some service to the country of my birth. Gentlemen, I confess I have left prison under a solemn sense of responsibility; I feel, I scarcely know why, that every word that I shall now utter will be scanned with the utmost scrutiny both by friends as well as by opponents—by friends perhaps with the best of motives; by opponents, I regret to say, with a view to bring discredit on that cause which is so dear to every one of us. (A voice "Fie on them.") I feel, I may say, a great load of unredeemed duties pressing on me, and that load will continue to oppress me until I have established, in part at least, my claims to that abounding sympathy which I have received from all sections of this great Indian public. (Applause.) But, perhaps, I exaggerate. I arrogate to myself the homage which was paid to the principle which I feebly represented—the rights of conscience, the freedom of the Press, the powers and prerogatives of the highest Court in the land, these were the burning questions which deeply stirred the national mind, and I was but the humble personage around whom the battle of principles was fought, and hence, probably, I drew that sympathy for which I am so truly grateful. Gentlemen, I have many things to say in connection with the events that have just recently taken place. I have, so to speak, a message to communicate to you, and I trust that you will bear with me for a few moments while I lay before you certain of those matters which have been pressing on my mind with painful interest for the last eight or ten days. Gentlemen, it is abundantly clear there has been a terrific outburst of feeling. It is impossible to doubt that circumstance. The nation has passed through a mighty convulsion, an unusual impetus has been communicated to the national mind—an impetus which, I trust, it will be possible for us to utilise for the highest of purposes; and what we, at present, seek to do is simply to take advantage of this splendid opportunity which has presented itself to us, in order to lay the foundation of a great National Fund. Gentlemen, I may say that in that explosion of feeling there was no section of the community which was so violently agitated as the womanhood of our country. They held meetings, they recorded resolutions, they sent me letters of sympathy. I received as many as forty letters from them, and one gentleman, who paid me a visit at the Presidency Gaol, said that he did so at the instance of his wife. I say this feeling ought to be consolidated; it ought to be deepened, for we know there is no impress which is so deep upon the mind of a man as that which a woman's hand lays upon it. And what is the means I would propose, the method which I would venture to suggest, for the consideration of this meeting? Well, gentlemen, I live in a village, and, therefore, I am to some extent able to gauge the influence which ladies working in a noble cause are oftentimes able to exercise. There are Christian ladies in connection with Zenana Missions, and there is one such Mission in the village where I live. I may truly say, speaking of this Mission, that it has shattered to pieces the fabric of Hinduism in the village, and has created a revolution in our domestic circles. The work of construction may not be so perfect; but the work of destruction is all but complete. Therefore we have this fact clearly established that European and Eurasian ladies, although they are strangers to our language, and strangers to our manners and customs, yet, when they become missionaries in a good cause, are able to effect a mighty revolution in our homes. Why should we not be able, taking advantage of this explosion of feeling, to organise female agencies to preach the cause of social reform and political advancement? I know there are difficulties in the way; but they do not seem to me to be insuperable. We have many advanced and educated ladies in Bengal at the present moment. Might we not utilise them for this grand, this noble, this highly patriotic object, so fraught with good to the country? Funds will be required; but if one such agency is started, then, under the immutable law of growth, a hundred more will, in time, spring forth in different parts of Bengal. Our womanhood represent an unutilised source of power. They are there rotting, wasting their energies. Why should we not utilise them for a purpose which will be so highly beneficial to the interests of the country? You are about to raise funds for constitutional agitation; but I hope they will be used for other purposes besides agitation, and this is one of those purposes. Anybody who looks around to see what is taking place now in the country cannot but be impressed with the solemnity of the situation. There are moments which constitute a crisis in the life time of a nation, and I verily believe such a time has now arrived in the history of our country; and it is one of those times when the practice of moderation has become a virtue of the highest moment. I earnestly wish we should forget the past, and let bygones be bygones. I, for my part, have no wish to carry on this war of recrimination which is likely to be attended with fatal results, as far as we are concerned. It is for the credit of the Supreme Government that I would ask you to practise moderation. What is the charge brought against the Supreme Government? Even by responsible leaders of the Opposition, by men in the position of Lord Salisbury? Why, they say Lord Ripon is directly responsible for the deplorable state of feeling between the European and Native communities. Gentlemen, is Lord Ripon responsible for this state of things? I say, no. (Loud cries of "No" and a voice, "Those rampant Armenians are.") I believe I re-echo the sentiments of all my countrymen, and I anticipate the judgment of history when I say there never was an Indian Viceroy more anxious to cultivate the good-will of all classes—(applause)—and to preserve harmony among all than Lord Ripon. It is a calumny to say that Lord Ripon is responsible for this state of things. Who, then, are the people upon whose heads the responsibility must rest? They are truly responsible who threw the first stone, and who used the first harsh word in this unhappy controversy; but we will not recriminate, we will practise moderation and set a noble example. But let those who calumniate Lord Ripon know our sentiments, and let these sentiments be re-echoed from town to town in the United Kingdom. (Applause.) I hope Lord Salisbury will take note of the expression of feeling which has proceeded from the Press of this country, and which proceeds from public meetings in this country. We ought, I say, to practise moderation, and it is not merely an empty, barren sentiment which I would ask you to cultivate. There are strong pregnant reasons which I have to urge in support of my view. If we continued the war of recrimination, and went on retaliating in rabid articles for every rabid article that appeared in the Englishman or other newspapers, why, there would be the amplest justification found for the passing of another Gagging Act. Such an act would in theory be applicable to the European and Native section of the Press alike, but in practice would be applicable to you and you alone. (Cheers.) Therefore, for the maintenance of our rights, and for the preservation of the credit of the Government, it becomes our duty to practise moderation. Let us use judgment and discretion to tide over the crisis that has arisen. The resolution says that a fund is to be raised for the purpose of constitutional agitation. What, then, is constitutional agitation? What is that we understand by the expression? By constitutional agitation we mean agitation carried on within the limits of the law. We may hold public meetings to protest against the action of the Government. We may wait in deputations. We may send petitions. But we may do nothing which even remotely has the appearance of illegality about it. We take our stand upon the broad and unassailable basis of the law and constitution. There we stand, and there we intend to remain. We shall not permit ourselves to be dislodged from it, or be provoked into quitting it; and we shall discountenance all proceedings even remotely calculated to bring about a violation of the law. We venerate the law, we adore the principle of the law, we worship it, and we are anxious that the same feeling of veneration should be impregnated in the minds of our countrymen. But, gentlemen, there are those who say, "you are pestilential agitators—(hisses)—you do an immense amount of mischief. You are disloyal and seditious; you silently but surely sap the foundations of British power in India." Now, I put this question in all seriousness—Who are they who are really disloyal? Who are the men who are seditious and unfaithful to the Government of this country? Those who say ditto to every measure of our Government, good, bad, or indifferent; or men, like ourselves, who have the courage and manliness to speak out their minds? I again ask—who are the men that are disloyal to the Government? The supporters of Vernacular Press Acts, and the opponents of Native Jurisdiction Bills, or men who can fight against the Vernacular Press Act, and who can support the Jurisdiction Bill? I will not go into personalities, or I could rake up names of men who are not worthy to be called loyal subjects or faithful citizens, who forget what is due to their country, who forget that it is to the advantage of the Government that the truth—the whole truth, the uncompromising truth—should always be told. We are not disloyal, Opposition is not disloyalty, we are Her Majesty's Opposition in this country—the responsible Opposition of Her Majesty, and we are the more responsible, because here we are in a foreign country, the Government of which is unaided by representative institutions. Such a Government is likely to commit mistakes, and what does the agitator do? He points out to the Government the mistakes which they may commit. He warns the Government of the rocks ahead, and of the shoals and quicksands in which the ship of State might be wrecked at any moment. Are we disloyal, therefore, because we point out the mistakes of Government, or those sycophants who, in season and out of season, sing the praises of an erring Administration? I wish to avoid personalities; but the truth must be told. At the present moment especially, our position is not one of opposition. On the contrary, it is a position of active sympathy and co-operation with the Government of India. Here the Government is straining every nerve to pass the Jurisdiction Bill. From one section of the Native community it has received the most lukewarm support. I am here in the temple of truth, and must tell the truth. From the whole of the middle-class community it has met with the strongest support. The Ilbert Bill is a small thing in itself, but a great principle is involved in it. It is a test case to show whether the Government of this country is to be carried on according to the principles of the Englishman and his party, or according to the declared wishes of the English Crown and the English Parliament. It is this principle which has invested the Ilbert Bill with the importance it has assumed. I say, therefore, our position is not one of opposition. On the contrary, at the present moment, it is one of active sympathy and co-operation with the Supreme Government. I may just for one moment refer to a fact which will illustrate how important is the help which the Indian Association, at any rate, has rendered to the Government in the matter of local self-government. You are aware that the whole country thoroughly appreciates the advantages of local self-government. To whose efforts is the Government indebted for this consummation? It is to the efforts of the Indian Association that the Government is indebted for the lively sense of gratitude the Local Self-Government Bill has evoked throughout the country. The association sent out agents, held meetings, and created an agitation which convinced the country of the blessings of local self-government. Now, how is constitutional agitation to be carried on? We will say nothing immoderate, nothing indiscreet; but, at the same time, we will not yield until we have gained our point. We may lose to-day; we may lose the day after; but if our cause is based on justice and truth, it is bound to succeed in the long run. That is the code of the constitutional agitator. He never yields or submits. He is bound to triumph, because the question he is fighting for is based on the unalterable principles of truth and morality. But what is to be the modus operandi? We must work by means of associations. Associations must be established throughout the length and breadth of the country. There must be a network of associations throughout the Province. The Indian Association has already got many branches in many parts of India, but we want to have a branch in every district town, and every sub-divisional town. We want to have the pleaders, the pillars of every public movement, to take part with us. They are not Government servants. They need not be afraid of losing Government patronage. They can stand upon their rights. In every country the Bar has always fought most resolutely the battles of the country. I cannot forget that Daniel O'Connell, the great Irish Liberator, was also the leader of the Bar, and that Grattan and Flood were also both distinguished Barristers. Let there be, therefore, a thorough organisation of the legal element in the country. They will know how to drive a coach and four through an act without getting into the toils of the law. (Laughter.) But outside the ranks of lawyers there are others whose help also is needed. There are the shop-keepers, and there are the peasants. The shop-keepers are independent men; why should we not have their union? Why should we not have a ryots' union? Not long ago an English gentleman with whom I was speaking about different matters asked me in a somewhat contemptuous tone:—"Where are your cohorts? You agitate about various questions, you write to the newspapers, you create a hubbub in the country, but where are the cohorts, where are your rank and file, who are to support you in the hour of crisis and trial?" The remark made a deep impression upon my mind, and I said "Let ten years pass, and I shall answer your question. I shall bring out the cohorts from the deep quagmire of ignorance and superstition, and send them forth on their high errand of patriotic duty." Yes, we must educate the ryots, lift them from their present degraded condition to a higher level of moral and political existence. The Indian Association must take up the work of ryots' unions, must take up the work of shop-keepers' unions, must take up the work of women's organisation, and all these things must engage the serious attention of the association. But money is needed, and, therefore, we require a national constitutional fund to aid us in this work; and how are we to raise this money? I have a suggestion to make in this connection. How do the Wahabis raise their funds? I speak of the Wahabi reformers, and not the Wahabi rebels; so they need not be afraid. They do it in this way. Every householder puts by a handful of rice before he takes his meal, and these handfuls are all collected in the course of the week, and then they are taken to the mosque for the Wahabi Missionary to come round and take them up. In this way a fund is raised for the maintenance of the Wahabi Mission. Why should we not be able to organise in such a manner that by imposing the least possible amount of hardship we might raise a large sum from the opulent people of Bengal? Why should we not be able to organise so that every village in Bengal might pay one rupee which should be collected from the Mundle of the village? We should ask him—"Will you pay this amount to the National Fund? We know nothing about the villagers, but we know you, the distinguished head of this representative village. Will you pay us your rupee and let us be gone?" If there are ten lacs of villages, then, instead of six lacs, we should get ten lacs of rupees, and we should not have inflicted the least hardship on any one. Well, now, what about the towns? Let us go to the Mofussil towns first, and with reference to them I would say, let us ask an anna from every householder. Mofussil people are not so rich as these gentlemen here, and they will not be able to pay a rupee per family. If you tried to get a rupee, they might come out with a big club, and pay you something which you did not bargain for; but every one can pay an anna; therefore, I say, let us have an organisation such as I suggested for the Mofussil. Now, we come to this town. It is a very large place to manage. There are 500,000 people in it, and each a John Stuart Mill on a small scale. Each man can act and think for himself, and if you go to any one of these gentlemen for a subscription, you must be prepared to answer all his questions. He will make a thousand suggestions, and after you have expressed your readiness to comply with them, he will perhaps pay you eight annas. What I suggest is that a man should be appointed for each parah consisting of fifty or sixty houses. There is always one man who is the dalapatti of the parah, and we might engage his services, and, I think, if we were able to form an organisation of this description, we should be able to raise at least one lac of rupees from the town. Some people will say, All this looks very well on paper, but where are your agents? Where are those who are to devote their time and labour, who are to sweat and toil and delve and die if need be in this work? I ask, Are there any such men in this great gathering? Has not the present crisis brought to the front such men who are prepared to devote themselves with unflinching energy to the interests of their country? I see here six or seven thousand men—are there not to be found in this great gathering of my countrymen some fifty or sixty men who will do this work and go about from parah to parah and make the dalapatis pay? If there are such men, will they at once place themselves in communication with the Indian Association? And, I may say, work will be given to them, which will be productive of the greatest good to the country, and also be extremely agreeable to them. I venture to suggest this organisation, but I am afraid I have taken up too much of your time. (Cries of "No, no.") Well, gentlemen, there is one part of the resolution which especially recommends itself to me, and which will strike a chord of sympathy in the other Presidencies of India. It is that the other Presidencies should be invited to join in this movement. I look upon this as a message going from Bengal to the other Indian provinces, asking them to co-operate with us in a matter of national importance. The prospects of Indian regeneration must depend upon the co-operation of the different Presidencies and provinces. Not long ago a newspaper Editor published what purported to be a conversation on the part of a Sikh soldier who was reported to have used the most contemptuous language in reference to the natives of Bengal. I am inclined to think that the editor of that paper, after witnessing the grand and impressive demonstrations held lately in the Punjab, will come to the conclusion that either his informant was mistaken, or that he had drawn pretty freely on his excited imagination. There is, indeed, a strong bond of union between the educated natives in different parts of India, and was there ever a grander spectacle than that of which I was the humble centre not long ago? I say that instead of two months' imprisonment, I would gladly welcome two years if the result of it would be the consummation of Indian unity. The strongest sympathy exists between the different Indian races. A blow is aimed at high education in the Punjab, and Bombay and Bengal joins in the protest. Famine makes its appearance in Madras, and Bengal stretches forth her helping hand. Under British auspices, a distracted country, peopled by many races, bids fair to become the home of a great and united people. England has achieved many triumphs in history, but this will be the noblest of them all. It will throw in the shade the memory of her proudest achievements. A year of Waterloos will not equal it. Gentlemen, I think, therefore, that the Indian Association is to be congratulated on sending forth this message to the other Presidencies, asking them to join in this great movement. Gentlemen, I have only two or three things more to add. What is to be the object of this fund? What are to be the purposes to which it is to be applied? Of course, it is needless to say that it is impossible for me to state specifically all the objects of this constitutional fund; but I may state in general terms what we mean to do. The main object, therefore, is to bring the Government of this country in harmony with national aspirations, and in harmony with the declared wishes of the Crown and the English people. (Applause.) We want local self-government in perfection. We are anxious to have provincial self-government. We desire parliamentary institutions. We desire, in short, to be placed on the same footing with the colonial possessions of the Crown. They have the complete management of their internal affairs, subject to the protectorate of England. This is the goal which we hanker after. This represents the culmination of our efforts. God knows we are not sedition-mongers; we are loyal men; we are anxious to place broad-based foundations of British rule in the affections of the Indian people. I, for my part, regard British rule as providential, as one of the dispensations of the God of history. I am anxious for its permanence, and I have ventured to point out the conditions upon which its permanence may be secured. The days of government by physical force are, indeed, past and gone. A new régime has dawned. The empire of the moral forces is about to be established here, the supremacy of the moral laws is about to be recognised even in India; and Lord Ripon stands forth as the glorious apostle,—(applause)—as the representative of that new force which for the first time has made its way into Indian administration. We wish his name to descend to future generations as the originator of a new and beneficent epoch in our history. Above all, we desire the name of our honoured mother, the Queen-Empress of India, to be associated in our minds and in the minds of our children's children with this noble inauguration of a beneficent policy. (Cheers.) These are our hopes and aspirations. It may be said I am a dreamer, but the dreams of one age become the realities of the next. (Applause.) Dante sang of Italian unity 300 years before Italy became united. The German professors taught the doctrine of the unity of the Fatherland at least a hundred years before the Fatherland became united. So will it be with this ideal which is based upon truth, which is based upon liberty, and which is consistent with the most perfect loyalty. Therefore the ideal will one day become a bright reality, to the glorification of England and to the benefit of India. Gentlemen,—how, then, is this money to be raised? Is it impossible to raise it? An English paper which shall be nameless, because I am not willing to give offence, seems to think that Lord Ripon is the author of this agitation in favour of the Constitutional Fund. This newspaper editor argues that Lord Ripon's policy has created a violent ebullition of feeling, and that this Constitutional Fund is the product of this feeling. Therefore, on the principle that things which are equal to the same thing are equal to one another, Lord Ripon is the author of this agitation. But there is one unfortunate circumstance which makes this position wholly untenable. The Constitutional Fund is quite an old idea. There is not even the faintest appearance of novelty about it. The idea was put forward in 1879, before Lord Ripon came to this country. It was broached at a Town Hall meeting held in the month of September, and I was the person who proposed the resolution. It is, in effect, an old idea, dressed in a new garb, and we are anxious to give it a trial this time, because our countrymen have shown, during the last two months an unwonted capacity for self-sacrifice. Well, then, I ask, is it possible, to raise six lacs of rupees? Let us for a moment observe what the Anglo-Indians have done. A community of a few hundred thousand men have raised in the course of a few months a fund to the tune of one-and-a-quarter lacs. We count our millions where they count their thousands, and we ought, therefore, to be able to raise at least ten times what the Anglo-Indians have raised. I meet with no favourable response. (Sudden applause.) That is more welcome. That I take to be an indication of a firm resolve on the part of this meeting to do everything in its power for the creation of a National Fund. Our fathers often raised temples to their gods and goddesses, and spent thousands of rupees on their charities. Have we become deteriorated and degraded under the influence of English education? (Cries of "No, no.") When we have money, what is it that we do? I shall be plainspoken. What do we do when we are able to amass a few thousand rupees? We begin to read the Indian Mirror and to read the promissory note account. We begin to think of investing the money in Government promissory notes, or in houses, or perhaps in the purchase of Zemindaries; but the cause of the country, the care of the poor, works of piety—these do not claim our attention. This is deeply to be regretted. I hope the outburst of feeling lately displayed will show that we are at least as capable of self-sacrifice as our fathers were. You spend lacs at the Durga Pujah and other festivities. Let us have but a fraction of what you spend on these occasions. Let us appeal to the Durga Pujah makers and implore them to devote a part of their money to this National Fund. Let the Durga Pujah go on till the day of doom, but let us have some help from the Durga Pujah makers, and Durga will be thrice blessed. (Cheers.) Gentlemen, there has been a great ebullition of feeling. What is to be the memento of this outburst of national life? Posterity will read, not in the pages of the Indian Mirror, but perhaps in the pages of history, that on the 11th of May, 1883, a meeting of 20,000 persons was held in this hall, and the grief was so great that they could not find language to express themselves. Then they will ask—What became of all this upheaval of national life? Did it vanish away into thin air, or manifest itself in streams of wordy rhetoric? Will you allow that to be said? (Cries of "No, no.") Well, then, let us raise a monument to ourselves—a monument which will guide and instruct posterity; and what better monument can you raise than a National fund? Let each one of us then contribute his mite in aid of this great fund. Let boys, young men, and old men come forward with their contributions. I hope even the ladies of the Zenana will contribute. I trust the sound of my voice will reach them. Let each one bring a stone to the national cairn, and a goodly edifice will spring up, full of joy, of hope, and of beauty. (Cheers.) Gentlemen, when Bishop Latimer was being burnt at the stake, he said, "Brother Ridley, this day we will kindle a fire in England which all the waters of the Thames will not be able to extinguish." Oh! let us kindle a fire on the altar of our country which all the waters of the Ganges will not be able to put out. O! let us feed the sacrificial flames till they reach the footsteps of the Throne of the Supreme, and fill the land with beauty, and splendour, and glory. But where are the priests—where are they who, touched by the celestial fire, will feed the flames? Where are our beneficent workers, the propagators of the new faith? Let them gather round the banner of the Indian Association; let them disseminate the principles of the Association replete with national life; and then this darkness will disappear and the morning star of liberty and peace, and righteousness will appear resplendent in the Indian firmament. (Loud applause.)

THE PRESENT AGITATION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "INDIAN MIRROR."

SIR,—I am really surprised to see that those whom we adore as our idols, to whom we arrogate all kinds of excellencies, I mean our independent Britons, have nearly all, except an honourable few, who are more fond of justice and equality than ostensible superiority, gone astray in connection with the great agitation which is convulsing the Indian Empire. Every ridiculous occurrence, every scandal, and in fact, every unfortunate event are so artistically twisted and turned as to be capable of being attributed to either the Ilbert Bill or Babu Surendra Nath Banerji's clique. I really wonder how Englishmen whose intellectual superiority is undeniable, can be led to believe what foolish people say at a moment of great excitement. Can anything be more preposterous than to dismiss an old and veteran Government employé from service, simply because he was suspected of being interested in Surendra Babu's party? Does not this unreasonable conduct shock the conscience and bewilder all sense of eternal justice? Really, Sir, my greatest apprehension is that there is still a worse day kept in store for us, poor Hindus, from which, however innocent we may be, there is no escape.

If those to whom we look up as our guardian angels for redress from every grievance we suffer from, are, unfortunately, so much biased against us, what safety can there be for us who are merely a passive set of people, ready to undergo every degree of dishonour and privation to secure our so-called health and peace? I am not one of those who are bold enough to say that the time has arrived when we shall stand upon our own legs, and let the world know that we are no less a nation in the world than is England, France, or Germany. Then why clamour for nothing? Nature can be conquered by submission, says Lord Bacon in his "Novum Organum," and let us, I say, try to govern Englishmen by that noble policy, and I dare say we shall see the sun shining over our heads brighter and brighter every day till we have asserted our superiority over them, not by means of force or policy, but by honestly showing by our own acts and deeds, how richly we deserve their sympathy and kindness.—Yours, &c.,

THE NATIONAL FUND MEETING IN CALCUTTA.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "INDIAN MIRROR."

SIR,—I have a few words to say with reference to the National Fund Meeting, convened by the Indian Association. I hope you will kindly allow me a little space in your paper for the following few lines on the subject. I cannot really understand why such an important and influential meeting was held in a nasty bazaar, abounding with bad smells. A meeting of such great importance should have been held in a respectable place, with good and large accommodation. I wish to know whether the managing committee of the Indian Association tried on this occasion to secure the use of the Town Hall for the purpose of the meeting. I believe they did not ask the Police Commissioner for the hall, well knowing that there were many obstacles in the way of getting the use of it. It is fresh in the memory of the public that the Indian Association was not allowed to convene its meeting in the hall for considering the subject of moving the Privy Council to decide the question of the jurisdiction of the High Court in contempt cases. It is, therefore, presumed that the committee would not have held the present meeting in a bazaar, if they could hope to get the permission of using the hall. I know that the hall is a public property, and was built with a fund nearly the whole of which was contributed by the native community. It is, so to speak, the property of the citizens of Calcutta. But the most amusing thing is this, that those whose forefathers had it built with their money, are several times disallowed to use it for no sensible reason whatever. I hope the Indian Association will move the matter, and settle it finally.

Another thing which struck me most was that the members of the British Indian Association were conspicuous by their absence at the meeting. The subject of discussion at the meeting was of vital importance to all sections of the Indian community, and everyone who has the good of his country at heart should, therefore join it. I do not know what motive led the great men of the British Indian Association and the aristocracy of the town to absent themselves from the meeting. It was not a disloyal meeting, it was not convened for the purpose of vilifying the Supreme or any Local Government, its object was not to shower insults on the section of any community, that they feared to join it, lest they should incur the displeasure of any one. Those who did not attend the meeting and condemned it as disloyal, I should class them with the direct enemies of their own country. If they aim at gaining the favour of Europeans by doing such unpatriotic and cowardly acts, they should know it full well that sensible Europeans will in turn hate them with all their hearts.

I heard some speakers say that the managing committee of the Indian Association would care very little for receiving money for the National Fund from the rich men, and that they would appeal to the middle and the poor classes for the purpose. I would advise them that they should not slight the rich class; in this way they may lose their sympathy and may turn them enemies of their country. When they will see that the rich men do not take interest in a national movement, they should, instead of slighting them, try hard to excite a national feeling in them. They should combine together all sections of the community, and should teach them to think for their own country. It should be borne in mind by all that "united we stand, and divided we fall." I hope that the committee will get the sympathy of all sections of the Indian community, high and low, rich and poor, learned and ignorant, and move heaven and earth to establish a National Fund.—Yours, &c.,
Bhowanipore, July 17. K. CHATTERJI.

A NATIONAL ASSEMBLY WANTED FOR ADMINISTERING A NATIONAL FUND.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "INDIAN MIRROR."

SIR,—Every Indian must confess that yesterday, the 16th of July, was an important day for our country. The speeches, delivered by Babu Surendra Nath Bannerji and Babu Kali Churn Bannerji, infused new vigour into the minds of those who assembled at the Bazaar of Babu Anath Nath Deb, and will, no doubt, fill with enthusiasm the hearts of those who will read the same in the columns of the daily papers. The inauguration of a National Fund for national purposes, was proposed and carried with acclamation. It was further proposed that the Indian Association be requested to take charge of the Fund, and make all expenditures necessary for the good of the nation, morally and politically. This proposition, too, was carried.

The object of Babu Surendra Nath Bannerji is a highly laudable one, indeed, and the methods he suggested for raising the fund were to a great extent feasible, being in consonance with the ways of both town and village life in Bengal, and not inconsistent with the general manner of raising subscriptions in this country. But one great question underlies the project, and although Babu Kali Churn touched on the point, he did not go deep into it, and left the matter as unsatisfactory as ever. He spoke of the high character of the Indian Association, and added that as accounts would be kept by them and shown to the contributors in meeting, there could be no room for doubt as regards the application of the fund. Let no one dispute Babu Kali Churn's theory; but what will induce people to make the Indian Association, however trustworthy persons they may individually or collectively be, the trustees of their money?

The first point deserving of consideration is "who constitute the nation?" A parcel of schoolboys in tumultuous meetings assembled do not certainly represent the nation; nor will the schoolboy of to-day have the same ideas ten years hence as he has now, so that the rising generation might be depended on for warm sympathy and active co-operation, at least after a few years. Are Hindus and Mahomedans the same nation? Religion aside, are not the interests, moral and social, of different communities and sects at variance with one another? Will the Zemindar be expected to agree with the ryot in his views of landed interests and titles? Let us not multiply examples; and without dwelling on this part of the question, let us briefly refer to the likelihood or otherwise of the people of Bengal, and of India in particular, acknowledging the Indian Association as a representative body of Indians. We assume that the Mahomedans, Sikhs, Hindus, and all other classes of Indians, have the greatest possible respect for the Association; but we cannot suppose that the Association, as at present constituted, will be regarded as able to meet the requirements and desires of the different classes. The National Fund can be used only for purposes common to all Indians; and if that be impossible, the object of the Funds is frustrated, and the grandeur of the scheme vanishes.

To my mind it is clear that if the municipal and political interests of the Indians are to be attended to, there ought to be a body of men representing the feeling and wishes of all classes of the native community. This may be achieved by a system of election and representation, introduced gradually into the country, and extended more and more widely as the contributors to the Fund become more and more numerous. I suggest, therefore, that the nucleus of a National Assembly be formed to which the contributors, according to rules prescribed, will send their representatives, and from which will proceed all measures of reform and all projects for the elevation of the country in all respects.—Yours, &c.,

THE ILBERT BILL.

["EAST LONDON LEADER AND TOWER HAMLETS RECORD."] INDIA has probably been to British Statesmen the most fertile source of trouble and difficulty from the first hour they undertook the government of that vast empire. Successive Parliaments in this country have had under their consideration weighty matters which have demanded the utmost skill in diplomacy to prevent dissatisfaction and bloodshed among the two hundred and fifty millions who people that great land or a change of Cabinets at home. The latest source of trouble has arisen over what is now becoming well-known as the "Ilbert Bill," which is a Bill remitted home to this country for the sanction of Her Majesty's Ministers, giving magisterial powers and jurisdiction to native magistrates, over Europeans resident in India. With many persons the objections raised to the Bill appear mischievous and out of all reason, when looked upon from the standpoint of equality and honour. It is urged that if a native of India by his perseverance and education attains a position which shall qualify him for the office of magistrate, there is no reason whatever that he should not occupy that office and exercise the functions appertaining thereto. This argument would be both right and proper were all other things equal in that country as they are here at home. It is only when we learn the difference between the laws, habits and customs of the people of India, that we can properly understand why it is the Ilbert Bill is both ill-framed and ill-timed. The fact is that to-day, almost as much as ever it was in the past of that people, the prejudice of caste, religious fanaticism, and hatred of the conquering British possess the minds of those many millions, while in but the smallest possible degree have they improved upon the condition of morals which influenced them fifty years ago. We do not for one moment lose sight of the fact that under British tuition the Indian is becoming better educated and consequently more moral, but until these better principles are accepted and made to influence the life and conduct of those who aspire to high places in the administration of the laws, we cannot commit the interests of our countrymen to the mercy of a native magistrate. The Government which will permit or authorise a native magistrate who believes in and practises polygamy, to decide cases in which English women, be they wives, or daughters, or sisters, are concerned is, to say the least, short-sighted, if not politically degenerate. Until the native gentry of India give to the women of their country the same equality of position we as Englishmen do at home—until they treat them with that honour and respect we are accustomed ever to render our wives and sisters—until then must the native magistrates of India be prevented occupying a position which shall place those we love most and best within the possibility of being treated with that degradation so common to the women of India; and for this reason, if for no other, the Ilbert Bill must not be placed upon the statute book of a people and country, whose one great glory has ever been Christian morality and righteousness.

["COLCHESTER CHRONICLE," AUGUST 11.]

COMPARATIVELY few people understand what is meant by the Ilbert Bill. The Indian Criminal Act Amendment Bill has been introduced into the Council of the Government of India for the purpose of conferring upon certain native magistrates and judges criminal jurisdiction over European British subjects. The principal objection to the Ilbert Bill is that the native judges, surrounded by native witnesses, with all their eastern disregard for truth, will have power to deal with the liberty and property of solitary Englishmen who may penetrate to distant parts of India. Those who thoroughly understand the subject, gentlemen who have spent most of their lives in India, have memorialised the Secretary of State, the Earl of Kimberley, to reject the proposal believing that the measure is not justified by any necessity either political or administrative, that it has already created excitement and agitation throughout India, and that it is calculated, if passed, to prejudicially affect the peace and prosperity of our Indian Empire. The social life of India differs so widely from our own that it would be dangerous to Englishmen, and Englishwomen in particular, to remove the safeguard which has hitherto been secured to them—viz, the right to be tried by their own countrymen, who are fully acquainted with their habits and mode of thought, and are able to judge what is and what is not compatible with innocence in their conduct. The non-official class in India occupy a peculiar and exceptional position. Their capital, their enterprise, and their labour have marvellously developed its agricultural, mineral, and commercial resources, and converted that country into England's best customer. Surely they are not asking too much when they claim from the Government they serve so well freedom to carry on their business without being brought before native magistrates who are quite unsuited to deal in a satisfactory manner with criminal charges against Europeans. The rich and opulent classes will most likely escape, but they are also likely to become victims to extortion; but what will become of the unprotected planter's assistant and the skilled mechanic—the bone and sinew of English enterprise in India—when placed at the mercy of the race we have conquered, powerless, even if they desired it, to avail themselves of the corrupt practices of Eastern officialism? The jurisdiction of native magistrates and judges must continue to be of its present limited character, and should on no account be extended to criminal matters. But the present Liberal Government have all the way through endeavoured to weaken our position in India as well as elsewhere. They have done all they could to facilitate Russian designs on India by way of Afghanistan, and now by Lord Ripon's advice they want to give the natives a power which will make the position of Europeans in India utterly unbearable, and be the thin end of the wedge towards the accomplishment of the design intended by the Mutiny of twenty-five years ago, and which it would appear to be the intention of the Liberals to assist, even to the gradual abandonment of our possessions in India, as they have in other places.

LORD RIPON'S ALLIES ON ANGLO-INDIANS.

WELL, these retired Anglo-Indians—who are they? While in India, they were great busybodies. They were Nawabs and Princes. They were rulers of men, arbitrators of our destinies, men who held in their hands the issues of life and death, and were armed with privileges to defy law, common sense, and good conscience. But, in England, they are magnificent nobodies; they are not talked of, they are not heard of; seldom they have a place in England's social circles; seldom they have a voice in her concerns and to know them is “to argue thyself unknown.” Will the reader believe it—Indian students in England are greater personages than their Anglo-Indian husbands in their own country? Well, this influential class of Englishmen, these eminent men have rushed forward to swell the ranks of the opponents of Mr. Ilbert's Bill; and this coalition, this unholy alliance is but natural, for there is a sort of affinity between them and Anglo-Indians here, which geographical limits can never destroy. Indeed, it is in consequence of this affinity that they are not treated with consideration by their own countrymen at home. An average Anglo-Indian carries on his forehead a kind of brand, as it were, which makes Englishmen in England shun him and his company. A tyrant here, it is feared lest he should pollute the free atmosphere of that island home of liberty, by saturating it with his queer notions and pernicious principles of irresponsible despotism. Of course, there are some honourable men among this class, and these honourable exceptions only prove the correctness of our observations regarding the majority. So much then for the soldiers themselves. Now, what are their weapons? We all know with what weapons Messrs. Branson and Co. fought their battles here. They had not justice, they had not reason, they had not logic on their side. They fought with the weapons of calumny and invective. They were defeated; their names were covered with unutterable shame, and their cause brought into contempt. And we rejoice to find that their friends in England have also commenced to flourish the same weapons. No argument, no reason, but an unending series of invectives, of insults, of menaces and threats—all kinds of meaningless platitudes, brag and bluster of every description, all possible exhibitions of impotent rage, have been called into requisition by the opponents of the Bill in England.—Amrita Bazar Patrika.

MORE OUTRAGES ON ENGLISHWOMEN IN CALCUTTA.

To the already long list of recent outrages by natives on Europeans in this city must, we regret to say, be added one more, which, though fortunately it resulted in nothing more serious than alarm, was, in one aspect, quite as daring as any of those that have gone before. At about 3 a.m. on Friday last, a lady living as a guest with the family of a gentleman who fills one of the highest offices in the service of the State, and a proportionately conspicuous position in Calcutta Society, and occupying a room on the ground floor, was aroused from her sleep to find a strange native by the bedside, with his hand on her knee. On she screaming loudly for help, the scoundrel, who appears to have entered through an adjoining bath-room, beat a hasty retreat and succeeded in making good his escape before assistance arrived. The police of the neighbouring station were promptly communicated with, but have been unable to obtain any clue to the identity of the trespasser.—Englishman.

THE EXPLANATION OF THE OUTRAGES BY THE “AMRITA BAZAR PATRIKA.”

THE real fact is, the Englishman has managed to create a panic amongst the European ladies in India. The lady, alluded to in the above paragraph, was probably reading the Englishman before going to sleep, and so she dreamt horrible dreams, how a native had entered her room, &c. In her fright she screamed loudly, and of course found nobody. This theory explains the mystery completely.

THE SAFETY OF ENGLISHWOMEN IN INDIA.

THE following letter appears in the Pioneer :—

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE “PIONEER.”]

SIR,—If you will kindly insert the following lines in your paper I should be very grateful. It seems to me that the horror and indignation felt by all Englishwomen in India at the proposed amendment of the Criminal Jurisdiction Bill are but imperfectly expressed. But though with the exception of Mrs. Beveridge's noble letter and, if I remember rightly one other, we have been silent, let it not be supposed for one instant that we do not feel deeply and intensely the indignity it is proposed to put upon us. Is it possible that Lord Ripon does not see what a cruel wrong he would be doing us in sanctioning this Bill? Can he not see how the mere suggestion of it is bearing fruit already in the outrages on English ladies lately reported in the papers? What is to become of those among us if such a state of things continues, who, from the nature of their husbands' work, are frequently compelled to remain alone for many days at a time? Have we not enough to endure in India, isolated as we often are, suffering from the climate, and separated from our children, without the addition of a constant fear of personal attack? Has Lord Ripon no feeling of regard for his countrywomen that he should seek to expose hundreds of them to an anxiety so cruel? Perhaps he does not understand, surrounded as he himself always is, what it is to be left quite alone and far away from all Europeans. Surely all that has happened lately, and the bad feeling that is so manifestly entertained towards us, are additional reasons for the withdrawal of the Bill. Has Lord Ripon no memory of the events of the years 1857-58? They are fresh in the minds of most of us, and I, as the daughter of one who fought bravely and suffered severely then, claim to be heard, not only for myself, but hundreds of my sisters in India; and I would fain urge those of my countrywomen who are ignorant of the use of firearms, to acquire a knowledge of them without delay, so that, should occasion arise, they may not be found unprepared. It is grievous, indeed, that a consideration of the necessity for such a precaution should be forced upon us. I will not take up more of your space; I only wish that feeling so deeply I could express myself more strongly.

INDIGNATION.

A GLASGOW MAN ON THE ILBERT BILL.

THE Glasgow News publishes the following interesting letter to a friend from a Glasgow man, Mr. R. R. Dunsmuir, now in Calcutta, with the charge of some important works, on which many native workmen are employed :—

“CALCUTTA, July 6.—I hope that the people at home did not expect that the Criminal Procedure Jurisdiction Bill would not meet with opposition. Did they think that Englishmen here in India were to lose the rights and privileges they have so long enjoyed, and be judged, perhaps for their life, by a Hindoo Pagan, without right of appeal to be judged by one of their own countrymen? It is all very well for people sitting at their firesides at home to talk about equality, &c., but a Hindoo will never be the equal of an Englishman, either intellectually, morally, or physically. As a race, they are treacherous, deceitful, avaricious, and cowardly. . . . They now say, “O, we can do quite well without Europeans—we can get on without Englishmen.” Why, who taught them anything they know—was it not the English? Who made their country what it is—was it not the English? Who now protect them from savage conquerors of their own race but the English? They can do without us, they can fight for their own country, and protect their own homes! It is all a delusion to think it, poor, miserable, effeminate creatures that they are. I speak of the Bengalees, those who have been at the root of all this turmoil, and have been the cause of stirring up all this party feeling and race prejudice; and the evil has been nursed by the silly sentimentality of a thoughtless man who has gone blindfolded into the matter anent this bill, never taking into consideration the vast amount of harm he has done, or will do, towards his countrymen if this bill is passed into law. It would put a fearful amount of power into the hands of these natives, who can be made to do anything by bribery—who would swear black is white for four annas. This is not exaggeration, but simply fact, as has been proved in more cases than one, where these fellows (not the ignorant class, but those highly educated in our colleges) have been known to swear the most atrocious lie for a trifling sum of money. Now, fancy an Englishman in an outlying district coming under the power of native lawyers—perhaps not another white man within miles of him—and brought before a native judge, whose race feeling is all against his prisoner, and where false witnesses can be bought in any quantity for a few copper coins. Is it not rational that Europeans should take steps to prevent, or try to prevent, such from ever taking place? One evil that the Bill has done already is that the people are getting unruly; riots are not infrequent; outrages are becoming common; scurrilous paragraphs are appearing in the native prints. You may have noticed one instance of this in which the editor and proprietor of a native organ was brought before the High Court for a libellous article, tried, and found guilty, and sentenced to two months' imprisonment, without the option of a fine. Young Bahoos, who two years ago would not have dared to do such a thing are now making a practice of assaulting solitary persons, more particularly Eurasians, and after doing so taking to cowardly flight. Those people who talk about putting Hindoos on a level with Englishmen ought to come out here to India, and I could wager any amount that in a very short time they would change their key, and come to despise them, as my experience now forces me to do. Of course, there are exceptions to every rule, and there are some good men among the Hindoos, but they are like a drop in the bucket, I sincerely trust that this present Viceroy will be called out of the country, and a man put in his place who will not tamper with the regulations necessary to ensure the personal safety of his countrymen, not to speak of their comforts and privileges. I don't believe there is a European in Calcutta, except the officials of the Liberal Government, whose heart is not filled with indignation at the attempt to pass this Native Jurisdiction Bill. You have heard of the great public meeting against it; and of the Anglo-Indian Defence Association formed to watch over the interests of our countrymen. The Bill was never dreamt of by the mass of the people until it was got up at the instigation of a few ambitious Bengali Baboos who have their own purposes to serve. The result is this, that there has not been so much excitement stirred up in the native mind since the time of the Mutiny. I believe that this present turmoil has already destroyed much of the advancement made in India during the past twenty years, and has rekindled the old bitter race feeling against the English which was so rapidly dying out, but which a very little excitement is sufficient to bring forth again."

THE INDIAN POLICY OF THE GOVERNMENT.

In the House of Commons on Tuesday, on the order for the second reading of the Appropriation Bill, Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said:—One of the great and cardinal points of the policy of the present Government was that they were going to entirely set aside the wicked policy of their predecessors in Afghanistan, and that they were themselves about to adopt a policy of entire abstention from interference in the concerns of that country. Now, however, we require some further explanation, for we hear that a large subsidy is to be paid to the Ameer. That subsidy is apparently to be given with no fixed treaty or arrangement, but still it is obviously to be given with the intention of making ourselves the masters of the foreign policy of Afghanistan. (Hear, hear.) In fact that is very much the policy of the late Government, but we ought to have a clear understanding in regard to the policy which Her Majesty's Government are pursuing, and to the reasons which induced them to think it necessary to offer this large subsidy. It looks as if they thought it more necessary to take precautions against the advance of some other Power than they have hitherto been willing to admit. When I refer to India it is impossible not to say a word on another cause of anxiety which we have in that country. I do not wish, however, to dwell upon it at any length, as we shall have some other opportunity of discussing it; but I wish to express my own feeling very strongly on one point. I think, as I have always thought, that it is of the highest importance that we should take such measures as can be taken for a proper system of the admission of the natives to a share in the administration of justice. At the same time, you must also show that you have had consideration for the interests and the feelings of the Europeans in India, and the reconciling of these two objects is a matter of considerable delicacy and difficulty. Now, it seems to me that the steps taken in India, with no doubt the best possible motives, have been taken at a time and in a manner that tend to make more difficult of attainment the very object which we all desire to attain. The Government have raised a storm which was perfectly unnecessary. (Hear, hear.) They have thrown back the question of the proper employment of natives instead of advancing it, and I cannot but regret extremely the position in which we are placed. I am most anxious that we should abstain from making Indian questions questions of a party character. (Hear, hear.) We are very imperfectly informed on many questions that have arisen, and I should deprecate anything that would interfere improperly with the action of the Indian Government, but so far as our expressions of opinion on this side of the world could go I would be most anxious to impress upon those responsible for the conduct of Indian affairs the very great delicacy and difficulty which appears to us to be in the way they are now pursuing. As to the precise steps which are to be taken when the matter comes next under review, I abstain from saying anything with regard to it. I hope there will be no false pride in the matter and no neglect of that which must always be regarded as the first consideration—what is due to the Europeans in India. They are the men, after all, to whom we must look for much that is to be done in the improvement of India. I speak of the unofficial Europeans. It is to their capital and enterprise that India must in the future largely owe its progress. (Hear, hear.) And it is the confidence that they will inspire, and which our official Europeans will inspire in the whole country, to which we have to look as the great safeguard of our position there. When speaking of India we must take care that we do not confuse a particular class who are affected by such measures to which I have referred with the whole population of India. The whole population of India goes far beyond those classes, and we must bear in mind the effect which anything which will lower, or appear to lower, the position the English authorities may have upon the great mass of the Indian population, which we collect together under the general title of our Indian Empire. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. GLADSTONE, in the course of his reply, said: Then he (Sir S. Northcote) goes to Afghanistan, and he says it was understood we were never to meddle in Afghanistan. Who understood that? Who said that? Who pledged us never to meddle in the affairs of Afghanistan? How was it possible, when we found Afghanistan, once a united and comparatively happy country, broken and smashed into fragments and in a state of anarchy, to bind ourselves to such a proposition? We found Afghanistan broken into pieces, and we have done something towards its restoration—(cheers)—so that, at any rate, the future of Afghanistan will depend on the capacity and inclination of its people, and not on the will of a foreign tyranny. (Hear, hear.) That is something on which, I think, we may look with satisfaction. (Hear, hear.) The right hon. gentleman appears to glance with censure at the payment of a subvention to the ruler of Afghanistan. I do not desire to exclude that from debate or censure. But the right hon. gentleman spoke as if this was a proceeding without parallel or example; but the names of Governor-Generals who are remembered in India with honour and gratitude, Lord Lawrence and Lord Mayo, are likewise associated with the rendering of pecuniary assistance to the Ameer of Afghanistan. I am not aware that at any time any member of the present Government was bold enough to commit himself to the view that such a payment should never be made. The right hon. gentleman does not notice any of the things in which we took anything but an apologetic position; but as he refers to the professions that were made before the accession of the present Government, I may remind him that one of the favourite subjects at the election was the state of the finances. We had before us a long series of deficits, which threatened to become unbroken. I am happy to say that series of deficits has ceased to exist, and a series of small surpluses which represents the true principle of the balance between expenditure and revenue has taken their place. (Cheers.) With respect to reticence, I am surprised that the right hon. gentleman should refer to it. I have no wish to go back on former years, but I confess that my opinion is that reticence was never carried so far within my knowledge as in the time of the late Government. Never. It was in March, I think in 1878, that the conferences of Peshawur were held, which virtually determined the Afghan War. It was after these conferences, I think, that assurances were given in the Upper House that there was no substantial change in the policy, and it was eighteen months after these conferences that Parliament became aware that they existed when they had blossomed into the fatal and dreadful Afghan War. (Cheers.) I think it requires some courage to speak of reticence to us. The right hon. gentleman refers to the Government of India. I am glad to hear his speech in favour of the admission of the natives to office, but I am sorry to hear him, by hints and suggestions, convey an impression about the measures and policy of Lord Ripon which can only tend to weaken the hands of that nobleman. The right hon. gentleman says it is a very proper thing indeed to extend the admission to office to natives, but it has been mismanaged—the steps have not been taken at the right time; they have not been taken in the right manner; and, in consequence, the cause has been thrown back and great attention ought to be paid to the sentiments of the Anglo-Indian community. Well, Sir, I have had much to do for a long period with a series of questions, and I am not aware at this moment of any series of great reforms which have been brought about by the courage, and the wisdom, and the foresight of the British Legislature in respect of any portion of this empire which reforms have had the favour and support of the resident English community. (Hear, hear.) I do not remember that the abolition of slavery had the support of those residents in the West Indian colonies whose opinions, from their experience and knowledge, were undoubtedly of considerable weight. I do not remember that the establishment of a responsible Government in Canada and of that new system of relations with colonial institutions which has completely established harmony where before there was perpetual discord—(Home Rule cheers)—I do not remember that that establishment of responsible Government and that introduction of political reform were treated in the colonies by those who, up to that time, laid claim to what was called the British party, and represented themselves as having a monopoly of loyalty—I do not remember they ever received those reforms except with opposition. In 1862 the Government of Lord Palmerston re-united the people of the Ionian Islands with those of their own race, of their own religion, of their own feeling and condition; but there was a British party there, and that British party from point to point resisted everything that was proposed for the benefit of the people. Sir, it is the same thing all over the world; and it is not because these resident English communities are made up of people who are worse than our ourselves. Do not let it be supposed I have any accusation to make against them; but their position is less favourable than ours for forming a comprehensive judgment. They are doomed almost to narrow modes of examining these questions, and we are compelled to look over the course of history and over the surface of the world. They each of them look at themselves in relation to persons whom they feel to be in energy and certain practical effects inferior to themselves, and there is a tendency to indulge in a spirit of ascendancy which it is the business of this House and of this Legislature and the business of a patriotic Governor General with wisdom and with care, but with decision, to modify and to check. No evidence has come before me and none before this Government to convict Lord Ripon of any want either of courage or discretion in this matter. It is true that there has been great resistance to Lord Ripon. If it is not impatient, I may mention that I have a son in Calcutta who is a thorough approver of Lord Ripon's policy, and I am bound to say his report is he is not certain whether he can find three other men in Calcutta who can agree with him. (A laugh.) This is not the first time that such a state of things has existed. Go back to the time when Indian natives began to be entrusted with judicial functions; go back to the time when the liberty of the Press was enacted in India; go back to the period of Lord William Bentinck and Lord Macaulay, and you will find that the storm which has arisen in India, violent as it is, is less violent and less menacing by far than the storms which then arose. And so it will be in the future. You will go on—you will be compelled to go on. But I hope, what is more, you will be inclined to go on in the noble, and upright, and blessed work of gradually enlarging the Indian franchise. You will have so look this opposition in the face, and you will have to observe all the rules of circumspection and prudence in the measures you take, and no amount of circumspection and prudence will save you from that opposition. It will become milder from time to time. This Anglo-Indian community is made up of honourable and upright men. They may have their prejudices, and I think they have; but as they come nearer to the facts and look them more closely in the face they will begin by degrees to recognise they give to unreal dangers and to shadowy dangers an importance they do not deserve. Every step made in this direction is not only a step towards attaching to yourselves the minds of the vast population of India, but it is a step towards establishing between the different races of that country—between Europeans and natives—a degree of harmony which in former times did not exist. You have not to go back very far when any idea of any rights or capacity on the part of the natives of India was regarded as most unnatural and monstrous. Happily we have outlived that. But we have some other superstitions to outlive. (Hear, hear.) We have a work before us in the performance of which undoubtedly the powers and capacity—the moral as well as intellectual capacity—of this country will be severely strained. I confidently believe we shall continue to go on steadily and steadfastly in that path, and I am persuaded that if we are enabled so to do we shall more and more, from year to year, realise the debt of gratitude we owe to those Governors-General of India, those eminent men of whom we have had many, who have fought and laboured hard among the crushing details of their high office to inculcate among their fellow-countrymen the broad principles of generosity and justice towards the vast population under their charge and rule. (Cheers.) Those men have been the workmen, the most efficient and chiefest workmen, in building up that great and glorious fabric of truly civilised society which it is our duty, and task, and high privilege to administer throughout the vast regions of the world. (Loud cheers.)

Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said the community in India would read with alarm the concluding words of the right hon. gentlemen. It was a bold thing to say that hon. gentlemen in the House of Commons were better acquainted with the needs and dangers of our great empire in India than those who had spent their lives among the people of that country, and who were enriching it with their enterprise and their capital. It would be unfortunate if the Ministry who had produced anarchy in Ireland, and anarchy in the Transvaal and in Zululand, and anarchy in Egypt, and anarchy wherever their policy had had effect, should produce anarchy in India. That certainly would be the legitimate result of their policy.

Lord G. HAMILTON said he wished to refer to one point—that was, the policy of the Government with regard to Afghanistan. The right hon. gentleman the Prime Minister had claimed that he was following the policy of Lord Lawrence and Lord Northbrook; but a few words would suffice to show that the Government was affecting a reversal of the policy of Lord Lawrence and Lord Northbrook. What had Lord Northbrook laid down? That there was to be no fixed subsidy to the Ameer. (Cheers.) The action of the Government in 1873 had led to all the mischief which followed; and if they now gave the Ameer a subsidy they must take care that the money was properly spent. He was glad that the Government had adopted the course of giving the subsidy and of keeping their troops at Quetta, but what they were now doing was proof that they had blundered ten years ago. He hoped they would deal generously with any advances which might be made by the Ameer.

LORD RIPON'S FINANCES AND MR. J. K. CROSS.

THE following important letter appeared in the St. James's Gazette. It demonstrates the disingenuousness of Mr. Cross's statement about the £6,000,000 surplus:—

"SIR,—When, about a fortnight ago, Mr. Cross defended the charge thrown upon India for the expenses of the Egyptian campaign, he claimed credit for Lord Ripon in that he had in 1881-82, reduced the expenditure of the Indian Government by £6,300,000, and had promised a further reduction of £1,200,000 in 1883-84. Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett inquired whether these reductions included those caused by the cessation of war. Mr. Cross replied in the affirmative; adding that 'money spent on war and frontier railways is at least as irretrievably gone as if it were spent on useful public works.' This truism is quite beside the point at issue. The Afghan war naturally came to an end owing to the victories of our arms; and to give credit to Lord Ripon as if he had put an end to the Afghan war as a measure of economy was simply to throw dust in the eyes of the House. Mr. Stanhope's motion, on which the debate arose, was based on the uncontroverted fact that Lord Ripon's expenditure, exclusive of extraordinary charges for war and famine, was considerably in excess of that of his predecessor. Mr. Cross's reply was in effect that, including these extraordinary charges, Lord Ripon had effected large economies. The figures presented to Parliament will show the actual facts of the case. They are as follow:—

| Administration.   | Year.   | Gross Expenditure. | Extraordinary Expenditure. |                    |           | Ordinary Expenditure. | Increase under Lord Ripon. |
|---|---------|--------------------|----------------------------|--------------------|-----------|-----------------------|----------------------------|
|   |         |                    | Military Operations.       | Frontier Railways. | Famine.   | Total.                |                            |
| Lytton  | 1880-81 | £ 75,898,558       | £ 11,368,489               | £ 2,293,615        | £ 34,469  | £ 13,696,573          | £ ...                      |
|   | 1881-82 | 69,593,287         | 1,644,927                  | 224,682            | 1,000,000 | 3,369,609             | 62,201,985                 |
| Ripon   | 1882-83 | 69,379,500         | 1,337,200                  | 281,500            | 1,500,000 | 3,118,700             | 66,223,678                 |
|   | 1883-84 | 68,316,300         | Nil.                       | 67,500             | 1,500,000 | 1,567,500             | 4,021,693                  |
| Total increase of ordinary expenditure under Lord Ripon |         |                    |                            |                    |           |                       | £ 4,546,815                |

"The figures in the third column are those on which Mr. Cross's statement was based; those in the last two columns contain the real evidence of the comparative economy or extravagance of Lord Ripon's administration of the finances, so far as it can be gathered from the expenditure.

"I am aware that a portion of these charges for the last two years are defrayed from the balance of the Provincial Governments; but this does not affect the proposition that as a whole the ordinary annual expenses of the Government in India have under the present administration increased by four and a half millions. When the Indian Budget is presented to Parliament it may explain this prima facie disagreeable and discreditable fact.—I am, sir, your obedient servant, "T."

Amongst the arrivals at Bombay by the last mail steamer were Colonel C. J. East, late of the Horse Guards Staff, who has recently been appointed to the Brigade Staff in Bengal, vice Brigadier General Hughes; and Lieutenant the Earl of Airlie, Adjutant of the 10th Hussars.

ALLEN'S INDIAN MAIL.

TUESDAY, AUGUST 28, 1883.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

Our advices by the overland mail are, from Bombay, July 31; Madras and Allahabad, July 30; Calcutta, July 28.

We deal in our leading columns with Sir George Campbell's very remarkable statement, that he had "utterly failed" in finding a substantiation, in the Indian papers, of the telegrams about the outrages on Englishwomen in India. The following is an extract from a letter that has been placed in our hands, written by a gentleman of the highest social and official position in Calcutta, and referring especially to the outrage in Mr. Justice Norris's house:—

"Ever since Surendranath Banerji's case, Norris has been receiving threatening letters, some of them couched in the most obscene terms. The police authorities, knowing the Native feeling against him, without his knowledge placed a constable in plain clothes in his compound, and only removed the man two or three days before this occurrence. Another constable is usually stationed in the street near the house. At a certain hour he is relieved, and goes towards the thannah to meet his relief. This thing happened at the moment when he was away, and neither the man relieved nor the man relieving heard anything. There is an empty house next door, and the man evidently got in from it over the wall. He entered by the bathroom-door, which had only been fastened by a piece of string, turned down the lamp which she had left in full blaze. . . . She awoke and screamed, whereupon he bolted by the same way as he had come, and got off. When I first heard of Mrs. Hume's case, I did not believe in the theory of 'Superior instigation.' Now, I cannot but believe in it. It is certainly strange that the two cases should have happened, one in the house of the man who was engaged in prosecuting the High Court rioters, and the other in that of the Judge, who has been the object of attack of all the Native papers. The man who attacked Mrs. Hume is to be tried next week, and I hear that he is to be defended by a barrister, a most unusual circumstance in the case of a man in his position. There is a very decided feeling of uneasiness among the ladies here, and it is not to be wondered at, seeing that such cases have not been known before. Should more of them occur, there is every probability of a row."

ONE has heard so much of the rampant Anglo-Saxon and the mild Hindoo that it would be amusing, if it were not so serious a matter, to observe how entirely the tables have been turned under Lord Ripon's auspices. Here is an amusing paragraph which we take from last week's Friend of India and Statesman—though it was probably anything but amusing for the unfortunate European guard:—

"BRUTAL ASSAULT.—On Monday last a European guard, named Ashman, proceeding up in charge of a goods train, was most brutally assaulted at Mymari Station by the native station master and his staff. The injuries received were so severe that he had to be taken to hospital on arrival of the train at Burdwan."

No one has more persistently denounced the brutality of some low-class Europeans, in allowing themselves to assault natives, than the writer. Therefore, in common fairness, he is bound to denounce the brutality involved in this assault by a number of men on one. Moreover, we cannot but see that, if this sort of thing goes on, there is (as the writer of the letter quoted above aptly remarked) "every probability of a row." We would implore Lord Ripon to remove the irritating cause of all this bad blood between natives and Europeans before a worse thing befall.

THE great news of the week is that of the Town Hall meeting against the Ilbert Bill, held at Calcutta last Thursday. Surely after the testimony offered by this meeting, Lord Ripon will be unable to persist in his mad career. Bitten by vanity, a gad-fly more relentless than Io's, the Viceroy has refused to listen to every warning voice as yet; but now that the result of pressing matters to the bitter end can no longer be doubtful, we trust that wiser counsels will prevail.

Mr. Foggo has again been out into the highways and hedges, in search of "Anglo-Indian supporters of Lord Ripon's policy;" and publishes another list—of six names! We are glad to observe that there are some real live Anglo-Indians in this list; and not merely Anglo-Indians of that curious species Professor Max Müller belongs to—Anglo-Indicus Foggianus—the species that has never been in India. There is, at any rate, in this list of six, the name of Mr. Plowden, Lord Ripon's own Census Commissioner. Only, unfortunately, this distinguished gentleman's name has already been trotted out more than once; and indeed, if we recollect aright, it appeared either among the speakers, or among the adornments, of Mr. Bright's meeting at Willis's Rooms. Mr. Foggo's "five-and-forty pipers"—there are really forty-six, if you count Professor Müller and the other "accidental" Anglo-Indians—make a rare show in the eyes of the British public, when they are marched round and round in this fashion.

THE Bombay Gazette, as we pointed out last week, now discovers that it would all along have opposed the Ilbert Bill, if it had not been for the violence of the Calcutta folks. We would commend to our Bombay contemporary the example of the Western Morning News, one of the cleverest provincial papers in England. The editor has "views;" and like most viewy people, his views have a Radical tendency, which is probably anything but pleasing to the majority of his educated readers. So he hedges cleverly, by devoting his most interesting column to what he calls "Conservative views, by an Occasional Contributor." The result may be a little confusing to his more impressionable readers, but it is on the whole satisfactory to those who value a "balance of expression." Thus, in one column he holds forth, with Mr. Bright, on the claims of Mr. Gupta to our respectful admiration—claims which have never been denied by the opponents of the Ilbert Bill; whilst in the next column we read as follows:—

"Professor Leitner, who knows India well, has written strongly against the Ilbert Bill, and declares he is aghast at the proposition. In the debate upon the Indian Budget there was, of course, a great deal said. What ought to be done is to refer the varied and difficult questions of Indian self-government, and the social and political characteristics of the many Indian peoples to the proposed Indian Committee of the House of Commons. At present the amount of ignorance, which prevails is extraordinary. The country does not understand the real points at issue, and until some more light is let in, India must remain an obscure problem. Is there any Indian public opinion? Are there any real popular leaders? Do the Bengalee Baboos represent anybody but themselves? These are a few vital questions, and yet how few can answer them satisfactorily."

PROBABLY the calmest "staggerer" that has been put forward by Lord Ripon's supporters in the Ilbert Bill controversy, was Lord Hartington's proposition that the whole English Bench of the High Court of Calcutta was animated by "partisanship" in opposing the Bill. This was a fitting sequel to Sir George Campbell's courteous description of Sir Richard Garth as "an old Tory lawyer!" As to the epithet "old," it is probably far less applicable to the Chief Justice than to any man of his standing in India; and it is to be feared that both "old" and "Tory" were inspired by a remembrance of the naïve description of Sir George himself, as given by the Rev. Protap Chunder Mozumdar in his letter to the Rev. Keshub Chunder Sen's paper, the Liberal, which we quoted last week:—"It was in their (Sir A. and Lady Hobhouse's) house you meet with Sir George Campbell, like an aged kite, whose youth has ceased to be renovated. Whitening, hobbling, uttering feeble sentences, the fallen hero picks his way through the room. But he is a staunch Liberal for all that, speaking in and out of season."

THE impunity with which Lord Ripon has been able to carry on, so far, his crusade against the rights of property in Bengal, in the Bengal Tenancy Bill, is undoubtedly largely due to the fact that men's minds are all absorbed in the contemplation of "the crushing of the Anglo-Indians" under the Ilbert Bill. For this, if for no other reason, the Viceroy ought to feel bound in honour to give the Zemindars a little longer respite, before putting the knife in finally.

BUT for such a Government as that of Lord Ripon's, it is rather an advantage to be able to keep before the public eye one huge blunder, so as to divert attention from all the others. For instance, under a less stormy Viceroyalty, what excitement would attend the publication of the following telegram, dated Simla, Aug. 24:—

"Intelligence received here from Afghanistan announces a general rising of the Ghilzais under the leadership of the celebrated Mollah Mushki Alum against the Ameer's authority."

HERE at a blow disappear all the advantages supposed to have been purchased by the Kandahar "scuttles," and by the more recent disgraceful concession of black-mail to the Amir. With a general rising of the Ghilzais, our own frontier will soon be in a blaze. Those friends of Lord Ripon's who petition for an extension of his term of office little know what an ill turn they would do him, by detaining him to see all the calamities of which he has sown the seeds.

We take the following from the Indian Mirror:—

"Another act of lawlessness is reported from Hyderabad. As Mr. Conolly, the Municipal Inspector of Chudderghaut, was outriding one morning last week, he met the carriage of Nawab Alum Ali Khan, and knowing that such nobles are not particular as to whom they drive over he kept as much as he could to his side of the road. One of the outriders, however, deliberately made a thrust at him with his lance, the point of which caught the saddle, and ripped it up for about two inches. Mr. Conolly shouted to the Nawab, who passed immediately after in his carriage, to stop, but he merely laughed and did not even turn round to see if Mr. Conolly was hurt. The matter has been reported to the Nizam's Government, but unless the Resident is instructed to bring pressure to bear, there is no more likelihood of justice being done in this case than in the case of the assault on the Police."

MR. STANHOPE'S speech, in the debate on the Indian Budget, was perhaps the most powerful denunciation of the Ilbert Bill that has yet been uttered in England. He cited the High Court's letter with absolutely crushing effect, and fairly gathered into focus all the strongest arguments against this most pernicious measure. In striking contrast with the venom and misrepresentation that rule on the other side is Mr. Stanhope's conclusion—which possibly errs on the side of chivalrous respect for foes—wherein he expresses his confidence that Lord Ripon will voluntarily withdraw the Bill, on learning the enormity of his blunder. Mr. Stanhope said:—

"Now that Lord Ripon had received the opinions of all the local Governments of India we could not doubt they would have weight with him. There was no one who would deny that those opinions ought to be conclusive. Could they conceive that a measure ought to be passed which not one Local Government said ought to pass, and that it ought to be pressed upon an unwilling European population? He fully admitted the difficulty in which Lord Ripon was placed, but he hoped that even at this hour prudent counsels might so far prevail, and that Lord Ripon would not be carried away by the encouragement he had received from Radical clubs in England, but would look only to what were the real interests of India."

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON'S speech was not less effective. Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett, in opening the discussion, really traversed the whole question; and his exposition of the cruel and mischievous character of the proposed legislation has earned for him the lasting gratitude of Anglo-Indians, and well merited the praise it received from Mr. Stanhope.

THE North Star of Darlington thus deals with the latest development of Lord Ripon's Afghan policy:—

"When Lord Beaconsfield sought to guide the Ameer of Afghanistan, and compel him to respect British interests as understood by British officials, Liberals and Radicals denounced such interference as most mischievous and uncalled for, and Mr. Gladstone waxed eloquently wroth over what he indignantly christened a 'bastard Imperialism.' We ought to have nothing whatever to do with the Ameer, they unitedly said; 'let him manage his own affairs as seemed to him good.' And as for fear of wicked designs on the part of Russia—phew! Such a dread was only Russophobia. But what do we find? The Ameer not only dowered with an annual subsidy exceeding in value the united salaries of Her Majesty's present advisers, but given the money on this condition—we quote the words used by the Indian Under Secretary in the House of Commons last night—that 'he should regulate his foreign relations in conformity with the recommendations of the Government of India.' Which simply means this, that he is to do as Mr. Gladstone tells Lord Ripon to demand in all matters touching our Indian Frontier, or the reception at his capital of messengers or envoys from any other Court. If this is not proceeding exactly on the Beaconsfield lines, what is? The dead Tory Chief saw clearly that Russia was gaining an undue and dangerous-breeding influence at Cabul, and asked that England should be equally honoured. But the Ameer refused—refused with threats. Hence the Afghan War. What would the present Government do if the Ameer were to openly fraternise with Russian agents, and turn our representative out of Cabul? Say nothing at all about it, but turn the other cheek to the smiter—à la the Transvaal? Or do what the safety of our Indian Empire and our honour would demand—compel him to act as he was bid, according as our interests required? If the latter, what are we to think of the denunciations and howlings at the late Lord Beaconsfield? If the former, one more reason is supplied why the Gladstone Ministry should have such power for mischief taken out of its hands."

WITH respect to the Freight Market, the following is corrected up to the 4th instant:—

"Notwithstanding the fact that produce of all sorts is coming down much more freely than it has done for some time past owing to the reduction in railway charges since the first of the current month, our freight market has continued declining, as there is still an ample supply both of steam and sailing tonnage for all our requirements for some time to come. Besides this, new Jute probably is only arriving in very small quantities, and may not arrive freely for some considerable period. The amount of business done has been very small, the demand being almost entirely for steam tonnage. Only three ships have found employment during the week, one for London, one for Dundee, and one for Liverpool. Our unfixed tonnage stands at 51,189 tons."

WITH respect to Tea prospects, Messrs. Balmer, Lawrie and Co. report:—

"Our last report was dated 21st July. The weather throughout the manufacturing districts has been more favourable of late, but most gardens have a long way to pull up before they reach last year's outturn, not to speak of their estimates; unless the weather during the next three months is more than usually favourable, it is not likely that the total crop will exceed last year's, even taking into consideration the new extensions coming into bearing."

THE following with respect to Indian Tea Sales is from the circular of Messrs. Hart and Sibthorp, of Calcutta:—

"About 12,000 packages were offered at the usual weekly public sales held on the 26th instant, of which 10,626 found buyers, the balance being withdrawn for shipment or higher prices. There was but little demand for teas with inferior liquor, and for these, of which a large proportion of the lots brought forward consisted, a considerable decline may be quoted, but for teas with point and character, more especially those of Darjiling growth, there was fair competition, and prices obtained were in most cases fully equal to previous rates."

THE Times of India gives the following obituary of the week:—Mr. James Helm, Manager, Bombay United Spinning and Weaving Company, Bombay; Lieut. F. J. de Lisle, European Mountain Battery, Ghoorepoorie, Poona; Mr. Frederick Wilson, Mussoorie; Lieut. Laing Meason, 1st Light Cavalry, Bangalore.

THE WEATHER AND THE CROPS.

THE following is the official summary of the report of the Revenue and Agricultural Department on the state of the weather and condition of the crops throughout India, for the week ended July 24:—

"Although a general break in the rains seems now to have set in, yet during the early part of the week to which the reports relate good rain fell throughout India, except in some districts of the Punjab. In Bombay the fall was heavy along the Western Ghats, but some deficiency is reported in parts of Southern Mahratta Country. In Baroda and Surat the excessive rainfall of previous weeks has been succeeded by light showers. A break would be beneficial in parts of Central India. In Rajputana the rainfall has been light, but favourable; and the tanks have generally a sufficiency of water, except in Marwar, where they are empty. In Burma the rainfall, though below average, has been generally sufficient. Good rain has fallen all over Bengal; at Burdwan the fall was exceptionally heavy, but in some parts of that district and in Rajshahye, Rungpur, and Purneah more is needed for transplanting of rice. Rain continues to hold off in Gauhati; elsewhere in Assam the fall has been sufficient. Seasonable weather prevails over the Central Provinces, and prospects there are very favourable. In the North-Western Provinces and Oudh ample rain fell in all reporting districts up to the 24th ultimo, and the crops are reported to be doing well. In the Punjab the fall has been very partial, and more rain is much wanted in several districts. Harvesting continues in the Madras Presidency, and standing crops are generally in good condition, except in parts of Coimbatore and Tanjore, where they are suffering from want of rain. Sowings for the kharif have nearly been completed in the Bombay Presidency, Central India, and the Provinces, and are in full progress in the North-Western Provinces and Oudh and the Punjab. The cotton crop is being weeded in the Central Provinces and Berar, and promises well. Transplanting of rice is being pushed on in Bengal and Assam. In the former province harvesting of early rice and jute continues, and indigo manufacture has been commenced. Ploughing is nearly finished in Burma, and rice seedlings are being transplanted. The crops in the Deccan are seriously threatened by locusts. Cattle disease is reported from most districts. Cholera appears to be prevalent in Bombay, the Central Provinces, and parts of Bengal; and a severe epidemic is said to exist in the city of Agar in Central India. Prices are fluctuating."

TELEGRAPHIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE following is the usual weekly telegram from the Times correspondent, dated Calcutta, August 26:—

"The public meeting which was held here on Thursday last afforded a conclusive answer to those who maintain that the opposition to Mr. Ilbert's Bill is dying out. All the leading members of the non-official community attended it, and the audience was nearly, if not quite, as large as on the occasion of the previous meeting in February. It is evident that the Anglo-Indian public has not become reconciled to the measure or less determined to oppose it to the uttermost. The speeches were moderate in tone, and not a word was said that could give offence to the natives. But there was an unmistakable bitterness apparent against the Indian Government, arising from the belief that it had resolved to close its ears against argument and to persist with the Bill. This feeling was increased by two telegrams from London which had appeared in the local newspapers that morning. One of these was to the effect that Mr. Cross had stated in the House that the summed-up opinions of the Governments of Madras, Bombay, the Punjab, the North-West Provinces, and the Central Provinces were against a withdrawal of the Bill. The other telegram announced that Mr. Gladstone, replying to a question from Sir Stafford Northcote, had said that the Anglo-Indians were showing a spirit of ascendancy which must be checked. Whether those telegrams were justified by the facts remains to be seen. They were mentioned by all the speakers; and they have created an impression here that the home Government is as little disposed to treat the Anglo-Indians with fairness as the Government of this country is.

"Mr. Keswick, President of the Chamber of Commerce, who was in the chair, opened the proceedings. He pointed out that even if Bengal and Assam were the only provinces which opposed the Bill, still opinions coming from those provinces were entitled to the greatest weight, as their European non-official population was greater than that of all the other provinces together. Alluding, then, to Mr. Gladstone's statement and Mr. Bright's speeches, he expressed the sorrow which he, as a Liberal, felt at finding the Prime Minister so much misled; and he asked why Lord Ripon did not indignantly defend the Civil Service from the groundless charges made against it. He concluded by reading letters of sympathy with the meeting received from the Behar Planters' Association, the Eurasian Association, and various individuals of position.

"The first resolution was then proposed by Mr. Robert Allen, barrister, and seconded by Mr. Murdoch, merchant. Both gentlemen spoke at some length, and, quoting Lord Ripon's words in the debate of March 9, called upon the Viceroy to redeem his pledge of giving full consideration to the provincial opinions sent in. Mr. Allen especially dwelt upon the misleading nature of the statement which Mr. Cross was alleged to have made in the House of Commons, and said that the opinions of the Lieutenant Governors of the Punjab and the North West Provinces, when published in extenso, would prove the unfairness of describing those officers simply as being opposed to a withdrawal of the Bill. He also asked whether Mr. Cross spoke only of the opinions of the heads of provinces, or also of those of all the officials consulted. The latter class would show an enormous majority against the Bill, and the public, whose interests were affected, were entitled to have all the opinions before it which had been received.

"The next speaker was a working-man, Mr. Atkins, who attended as a delegate of the United Society of Railway Servants. Hereafter several resolutions passed at meetings of railway operatives held in various parts of India, all requesting him to attend last Thursday's meeting on their behalf to raise his voice against the Bill, and asking him to proceed to England to represent their case to his fellow working-men there. He said that if the Bill were passed, its effects would be most disastrous to the railway artisans in India. They had been watching this movement from the first, in the hope that the Government would listen to the voice of reason, and that Mr. Ilbert's Bill would be dropped. But they found that this cherished hope was not likely to be realised; they saw their right and liberties likely to be sacrificed for a mere utopian idea. They had therefore resolved that he (the speaker) should visit England, go before his countrymen, and tell them the truth. He then went on to point out how the measure would tell with especial severity upon the artisan class.

"The second resolution was proposed by the Rev. Mr. Finter, and seconded by Mr. Wallis, representing the Trades' Association. Both gentlemen delivered eloquent speeches, to which the space at my disposal will not permit me further to allude. The meeting then separated.

"The statement of Mr. Cross in the House of Commons, if correctly reported, would imply that the Governments of Madras Bombay, the Punjab, the North-West Provinces, and the Central Provinces oppose a withdrawal of the Bill. From what has already leaked out concerning the answers of those authorities, it is abundantly clear that a bare statement of that kind does not adequately represent their views. The report coming from Madras is said to go upon the same lines as that of last year. In that case it would seem that the Governor and Commander-in-Chief give a half-hearted support to the measure, while the civilian members of Council condemn it altogether. The Bombay Government accepts it only so far as it concerns native civilians selected by competition in England, and states distinctly that race distinction is a factor in the problem which cannot be got over by legislation. It may here be noted that the Indian Government in a despatch sent to Lord Hartington last September asserted that if the measure were to be confined to native covenanted civilians it would not be worth while to legislate; and Mr. Ilbert, when introducing the Bill last February, described its object as being to sweep away from the Statute-book at once and for ever all traces of race disqualification.

"The Lieutenant Governor of the Punjab grounds his support of the measure on what he considers the unconstitutional nature of the existing law; forgetting that if that law constitutes a breach of the Queen's proclamation so, too, does the statute of the 23rd year of Victoria, which creates a new Civil Service reserved exclusively for natives, and so, too, do the Executive orders of the Government shutting out Europeans from certain branches of the public service. Moreover, Sir Charles Aitchison proposes a modification which would crystallise race disqualifications by imposing on native magistrates before their appointments as justices of the peace a severe test from which Europeans are exempt.

"The opinion given last year by the Lieutenant Governor of the North West Provinces was quoted by the Viceroy in the debate March 9 as being that on which the Bill had been modelled. But Sir Alfred Lyall now asserts plainly that the question of extending the full powers of justice of the peace to native magistrates cannot be said to be a pressing one, that it is objected to by Europeans, and that it is not desired by the native community at large. He would cut down the measure to the smallest possible dimensions, by giving these powers only to such natives as are actually holding the office of district magistrate; while he would deny them to all other native officers, including sessions judges.

"Since Mr. Cross spoke it has become known that the Resident at Hyderabad and the Governor General's Agent for Rajpootana have reported against the Bill. Nothing has yet transpired regarding the details of the reports from the Central Provinces, Burmah, and Coorg. The Chief Commissioner of the Central Provinces is, however, numbered among the supporters of the Bill. The Chief Commissioner of Coorg was strongly opposed to it last year, and he is not likely to have changed his opinion. The Acting Commissioner of British Burmah was known to disapprove the Bill when it was first introduced. So much for the Heads of Administrations.

"As regards the subordinate and district officials, the 'eyes and ears' of the Government, as they have well been called, it is not denied that the enormous majority of them side with those who oppose the Bill. These considerations will show that Parliament and the British public cannot safely form an opinion on a mere telegraphic statement of the summed-up results, but should wait until they have full reports before them, and have an opportunity of weighing and considering them at leisure.

"A slight fall of rain has occurred in a few districts of the Punjab, but much more is wanted, especially in the south-east, where agricultural prospects are causing much anxiety. The crops are withering fast in the Hissar and Delhi divisions, and are suffering much in the Umballa and Julinder districts. The prospects are bad in the Lahore district.

"The Afridis, at a final interview with the Deputy Commissioner, have declined to accept the decision of the Government, and have left for their homes.

"A rumour was current in Peshawur last week that the Ameer had been assassinated by his nephew, Azig Khan, son of the Ameer Azim Khan. Up to last night, however, the Government had received no intelligence confirming this statement.

"The latest news received at the Foreign Office is that the Ameer was about to leave the camp Mama Kheyli for Cabul, after having given a cordial reception to Khan Bajom and some Orukzai chiefs from Herat. A correspondent at Lahore telegraphs this morning that it is reported the Ameer left Mama Kheyli for Cabul on Thursday last, and that the rumours as to his assassination probably arose from the discovery of some plot laid, but not executed."

"Sir Robert Sandeman has returned to Quetta, after a successful tour among the Kahar tribes, on the north-eastern boundary of Beloochistan. The principal chiefs of the country, including the Bori headmen, visited him, and without exception expressed their readiness to meet his wishes, and obey his orders. The route taken was the old caravan route to India, from Candahar and the countries beyond it, regarding which hitherto little was known, but which may become in the future of some importance as a trade and military route between these countries and the Punjab. Sir Robert Sandeman was accompanied by Sir Oriel Tanner and a small column of troops taken from the Quetta garrison."

THE following has been received from the same source, dated Calcutta, August 23 :—

"A great meeting of the European and Eurasian community was held here this afternoon to protest against Ilbert's Bill. Business was generally suspended at half-past four, and by five the townhall was densely crowded. The numbers present and the enthusiasm shown were quite as great as on the occasion of the meeting in February last, and it was evident that the feeling against the Bill was as strong as ever. Several speakers, representing different classes, addressed the meeting. The speeches were, without exception, moderate in tone. Among the speakers was Mr. Atkins, secretary of the Railway Servants' Association, who stated that he attended as the delegate of the working-men, and read resolutions passed at meetings of railway employés in various parts of India, requesting him to attend as their representative, and to express their strong objections to the Bill. He added that the artisans and working-men of all the railways in India had commissioned him to proceed to England to represent their views to their fellow working-men there; and that he intended to start at once.

"The following resolutions were carried unanimously :—

"First, that in the opinion of this meeting, it is a matter of paramount State urgency, in the interest of the whole community, native and Anglo-Indian, that the Bill for the amendment of the Criminal Procedure Code be at once withdrawn; but, in the event of the Government not consenting to adopt this course, that it is at all events imperative, as an act of public justice and political good faith, that the Government should publish in extenso, and without delay, all the opinions, official and non-official, which have been submitted to the Government on the subject; and that the Government should abstain from proceeding with the Bill until such time as both Houses of Parliament shall have had full opportunity of deliberately weighing and carefully considering those opinions.

"Second, that a memorial be drawn up, and circulated for signature, and be duly submitted to the Governor General in Council."

RADICAL TACTICS AND THE ILBERT BILL.

OUR Indian Empire contains, according to the best authorities on the subject, an area of 856,547 square miles, and a population of 197,815,508. Its rulers dispose of a revenue of seventy-six and a-half millions, fourteen and a-half of which are expended in Great Britain. It rejoices in a public debt of more than 150 millions sterling, and it maintains an army, European and native service included, of 190,597 men, with power to draw upon tributary chiefs to the extent of some 305,000 men in addition. It might be thought that such an Empire as this would be a source of pride to every English mind. It is not for nothing that England rules over a population equivalent, according to the ordinary calculations of such things, to one-seventh of that of the habitable globe. Strangely enough, however, the affairs of our Indian Empire seem to be of the smallest possible importance in the eyes of the average M.P. Once a year and once only they are brought before the House of Commons in the form of the Indian Budget, but it is found difficult to keep a House, and still more difficult to excite any—even the faintest—interest in the batch of statistics submitted for consideration. A wearied Secretary or Under Secretary, as the case may be, drones through a list of figures prepared for him in the India Office on some hot evening in July; a brief and perfunctory discussion succeeds, and in the course of an hour or two everything is settled and hon. members go off to their other engagements, happy in the thought that India is got out of the way for another twelve months. Such, it may be said, is the ordinary course of proceeding, and bad enough it is. In the present Session, however, Mr. Gladstone has introduced a new arrangement, which will serve to show, if it prove nothing else, how very little space the affairs of England's greatest dependency occupy in his mind.

Under ordinary circumstances the Indian Budget would have been taken on a Government night near the middle of July. Even that date is very late for the important business in hand, but Ministers who depend upon a domestic policy for their popularity are not apt to trouble themselves very much about appearances when anything beyond the four seas is in question. This year, however, the Indian Budget has been postponed from time to time until it is the merest farce in the world to bring it forward at all. After endless delays it was to have been taken last night. The higher powers intervened. The great and wise and good man who had kept a weary fragment of a disorganised House of Commons sitting until nearly half-past two on Sunday morning in order that he might get the Army and Navy Estimates pushed through without unpleasant criticism, found that it was impossible to give up so important a night as that of Monday, the 20th of August, to Indian affairs, and that it must be devoted to the far more important question of Supply, lest otherwise the House should peradventure be unable to rise on Saturday. It is, perhaps, a little singular in this connection that Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett should have given notice of his intention to call attention, on the discussion of the Indian Budget, to the Ilbert Bill and to the effect which the introduction of that most unhappy measure had already produced. The subject, as has been already pointed out in these columns on more than one occasion, is so abnormally grave that it is hard to understand why it should be left to a private member to bring it forward, and it is hard to believe that with a thoroughly competent leadership of the Opposition it would have been left untouched. During the past Session, however, Sir Stafford Northcote has, unfortunately, shown a distaste for the stir and stress of party strife and a general inclination to extenuate measures of which it is impossible to suppose that he could approve, apparently because they were the work of those with whom he was once on terms of cordial agreement. At the last moment, however, Sir Stafford took up the matter, and at the opening of the business of yesterday inquired about the Indian Budget, and also about the views of the Local Governments in connection with Mr. Ilbert's revolutionary measure. Mr. J. K. Cross's reply was in the style which he has unfortunately made familiar to the House since his appointment to the Under Secretaryship. The Indian Budget would not be introduced that night, and as to the Criminal Jurisdiction Bill—well, several of the Local Governments of India were opposed to the Bill and urged its withdrawal; some were in its favour, and from some the official reports had not been received. The answer was, in short, one of the true official type, and while partially true, was in the main incontestably false. As regards the further postponement of the Indian Budget, indeed, it was not necessary to say much. After having kept the House of Commons up well into the small hours of Sunday morning engaged upon the important business of Supply without arriving at a conclusion, it was hardly to be expected that so trifling a matter as the pecuniary affairs of India could be allowed to occupy the attention of the house for a moment—wherefore the Indian Budget is postponed once more. It is true that there was a promise on the part of the Government that Indian affairs should be taken yesterday, but we all know pretty accurately what the promises of Mr. Gladstone's Administration mean. After the flagrant breach of faith in the matter of the Army and Navy Estimates most people will be prepared for almost anything—even for Mr. Cross's answer of last night. The calm way in which he announced the determination of the Government to repudiate its engagement was only equalled by the airy fashion in which he disposed of the opposition to Mr. Ilbert's Bill. He must have known, none better, that English opinion in India is practically unanimous in its condemnation of that most disastrous proposal. He says that some of the Local Governments are in favour of it, but he does not mention which they are, and in truth he would be puzzled to do so. If he has taken the trouble to ascertain the most elementary facts in connection with this subject, he will have found out long ago that the Local Governments are unanimously opposed to the proposed change, and that amongst both officials and the non-official class alike there is the strongest and most bitter feeling in condemnation of the innovation upon which Lord Ripon seems bent. We shall hear nothing of all this, however, in the face of Mr. Cross's official answer of yesterday. That wonderful statement has served its purpose, and the Indian Budget and Mr. Ilbert's Bill alike are removed from the pale of reasonable discussion. The Budget will be got through somehow on Wednesday afternoon to a House of half-a-dozen languid and sleepy members—and Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett's resolution will probably drop for want of a seconder.

There are probably few, even amongst Liberals of the type of those who profess to consider themselves the only "thoughtful" people in the world, who will not consider this way of dealing with our Indian Empire nothing short of a scandal of the very worst kind. We have undertaken the government of a mighty Empire—one of the mightiest in the world, in fact—and we are content to leave the control of its affairs to an office in London. The House of Commons which professes to exercise a direct and interested supervision over all the doings of that office exhibits an ignorant impatience of its duty which is simply grievous. At no time is it possible to get more than a grimly acquiescent hearing when matters of Indian policy come up for discussion, but the Indian Budget—the one occasion upon which the dealing of the Government with the subject race can be fairly treated—is invariably thrust off to the far end of the session, and discussed in a thin and wearied House. This year the scandal has, it is to be hoped, reached its consummation. Delayed until the very last week of the session—for Mr. Gladstone has determined that the House shall rise on Saturday—the Indian Budget is postponed from the day for which it was last fixed, and will, when the time comes for bringing it forward, inevitably be got through in a fashion which to call perfunctory would be to use a flattering epithet. Radicals of the Caucus kind may think this a right and proper way of getting rid of a serious and solemn duty, it may be doubted if the English nation, when it awakens from the wretched torpor under which it seems to be crushed at the present moment, will by any means endorse their verdict.—Manchester Courier.

THE "AMRITA BAZAR PATRIKA" CONCEDES A POINT.

IN a recent issue we discussed those assertions of the opponents of the Jurisdiction Bill, which might possibly contain some grain of good faith. We forgot to maintain one of their great arguments—the lady argument. They say that the passing of the Bill will be an outrage against the honour and delicacy of Anglo-Indian ladies. From the beginning up to this time, in everything they have said against the Bill, they have invariably urged this point. They bring it forward so feelingly that there really seems to be a little ring of sincerity in this contention. If it is so, why do they not separate women from the men? Why do they not suggest a compromise to exempt the fair Anglo-Indian ladies from the jurisdiction of the swarthy judges of the land? Indeed, in making such a suggestion they will, in decency, be called on to couple with it another suggestion—viz., to exempt Hindu and Mahomedan ladies from the jurisdiction of European magistrates. But they can have no objection to this. In fact they assume the exemption of native ladies from the jurisdiction of European magistrates. They might easily allow this assumption to be turned into a fact. Thus, if the real sore point of the Bill be its touching ladies, this can be easily remedied. For the people of this country, Hindoo and Mahomedan, will be the last to object to any indulgence granted to the softer sex. And if this indulgence be conceded, there remains nothing for the Anglo-Indian gentleman to ask for as regards the Bill, which might be consistent with their pretensions to manliness and with their indignation at being called cowards. Surely, the manly Anglo-Indian does not require the protection of lady's apron! Surely they can well face the swarthy brow of a Native judge without fainting away! Why not, then, if you really feel concerned for the sake of ladies, boldly ask them to be exempted, and provide for similar exemption for ladies of this country? The whole thing may thus end in a compromise which none is likely to object to. They talk of compromise. But this is a compromise which might offend none.

RAILWAY EXTENSION IN INDIA.

THE Indian Government are about to construct a line from Calcutta via Midnapore to the Central Provinces. This will form a most important addition to the Indian railway system, for when completed it will be the direct route from Bombay to Calcutta, and it will also open up a very rich district of the Central Provinces. The extension of the Nizam's Railway from Hyderabad to Sironcha, on the banks of the Godavery, is also to be effected, and a line is also to be made between Sironcha and Chandah, by which the railway communications between Madras and Calcutta will be greatly facilitated and an easy outlet afforded for the extensive coalfield with which that portion of the Deccan bounds. The completion of the Nizam's line and the junction line between Chandah and Sironcha will connect by a base line the two existing lines running into Bombay from Northern India and from the north-west, thus avoiding the necessity, as it at present exists, of travellers and goods from the north to the south and vice versa being obliged to go all the way round by Bombay.

INDIAN RAILWAYS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "TIMES."

SIR,—In reply to a question asked yesterday by Mr. Sumners in the House of Commons, with reference to the earnings of all the Indian railways as given in my small work entitled "The Economic Revolution of India," the Under Secretary of State for India is reported in The Times to have made the following statement:—(1), That the total sum advanced by the State for interest on the guaranteed lines capital, may be put at £21,629,000, i.e., £23,647,000, minus £2,818,000 representing the surplus profits of the East Indian Line; (2), that the net revenue on all the lines, even when allowance is made for outlay in the shape of past interest charges, is still 4·6 per cent, although it is admitted that if loss by exchange on past transactions is calculated the net revenue would be less.

Will you allow me to say a few words in support of my figures? First, Mr. Cross forgot to mention the sum, roughly estimated in my book at £2,500,000, but shown in the recent return moved for by the Hon. E. Stanhope, to be considerably over £4,000,000, paid by the State as interest on the State railway capital, nor did he give an estimate of the item of "loss by exchange" directly caused by the railway remittances during the last few years. This item has now reached the sum of about £4,000,000, accepting therefore Mr. Cross's lower estimate of the sums advanced for the guaranteed lines, inclusive of the East Indian Railway, there is still a sum of about £30,000,000 over and above the net earnings of the railways up to the year 1881-82. If compound interest were charged we should arrive at a still larger sum. And as regards the past surplus profits of three railways, it must be pointed out that they have been largely due to the earnings of these lines during the famines and Afghan wars, and were paid by the State out of one pocket, at the same time that it put them into another. Thus the East Indian and the Great Indian Peninsula earned abnormally high profits during the years 1874 to 1878, and the Scinde, Punjab, and Delhi line, which in the year 1881 only earned 2·55 per cent., earned a surplus profit of £3,872 in the year 1880. In short, the so-called surplus profits would sink to nearly nil if these payments out of taxation were eliminated.

In explanation of my seemingly excessive estimate of past interest charges for the guaranteed lines, I may refer to pages 29, 32, of Mr. Juland Danvers's railway report, 1881-82, where the net amount of interest advanced for guaranteed lines is stated to be £24,962,440, and appears to be reckoned after the deduction of the surplus profits received by the State. I understand Mr. Cross to say that this is not the case; if so, it is difficult to reconcile the figures given in the annual railway report and the last financial statement. In the former the interest in excess of revenue for the guaranteed railways for the year 1881, is stated to be £161,827, and the State's share of surplus profits is said to be £326,097. If then we deduct the first sum from the second there is a surplus of £164,270 whereas in the financial statement for the year, March 1881 to March 1882, there is a deficit of £63,275 (the rupee being reckoned at 2s.) This difference has to be explained if a clear gain is to be shown as accruing to the State.

It is so important that the real results of the Indian productive public works should be thoroughly sifted, that I hope you will be able to find room for these remarks, which, in connexion with the discussion on the Indian Budget, may not be inopportune.—I am, sir, your obedient servant,

A. K. CONNELL.

RECENT HINDI BOOKS.

Nirmāna-vidyā: dwitīya Bhag. (Civil Engineering: Part II.)

By SRI NAVINA CHANDRA RAI. Lahore, 1882.

THIS is a continuation of a work on civil engineering, the former portion of which appeared last year. The first part treated of construction in general, and dealt with the strength of materials, the nature of supports, the formation of foundations, wall-building, bonding, &c. This second part consists of road-construction and bridge-building; and, in consequence of the extraordinary meteoric phenomena in India, there is much to be learnt by Europeans from Indians writing on these topics. The author has evidently mastered his subject fully, and writes thereon with confidence, explains with accuracy, and supports his statements with mathematical proofs. Books such as the one before us show most clearly the great change which is passing over Indian society. The era of loose diction, random assertion, and miraculous fable has passed away, and an age of scientific accuracy both as to language and thought has commenced. The Sanskritised form of Hindi which the writer here adopts is defensible in such books; for it is necessary to resort to some precise and flexible language in rendering technical terms, and no language is more suitable or ready to the Indian than Sanskrit. One noticeable feature in this book is the excellence of the illustrations. They are well drawn and carefully printed, and really illustrate the subjects to which they are attached.

Nyaya-Bodhini. A Treatise on Logic in the Hindi Language. By PANDIT SUKH DYAL. Lahore, 1882.

THE author of this book has prudently modernised the intricate method of discussing logical subjects in ancient Sanskrit works, and has not unsuccessfully laboured to bring the subject within the comprehension of ordinary University students. This author, also, of necessity uses many Sanskrit terms, from the simple fact that they have been the terms employed for thousands of years by all Indians who have studied dialectics. The gradual introduction of these precise terms from the ancient language is a great benefit to modern Hindi, and differs widely from the reckless use of Sanskrit words merely to give a high-sounding flourish to commonplace notions. The English reader will not fail to notice that these books not only teach the mental processes of reasoning, but discuss the physical constitution of the universe, and the nature and attributes of matter and spirit. Indeed the set purpose of the various schools of Indian philosophy is to lead up, by logical processes, to a right appreciation of the Divine Being, and the practical duties of man. Of the six schools whose disquisitions have reached our time, the Nyāya is that which most nearly accords with European methods of investigation; hence it has been wisely chosen by Sukh Dyal as the basement of his present book. Similar use was made of this system of philosophy in the very able Hindi book called the Siddhānta Sangraha, published at Agra, in 1855. This latter work was a bold and decidedly successful attempt to reconcile Eastern and Western science, actually introducing the test of experiments in aid of abstract discussion.

Ranadhra aur Premamohini. A Drama by LALA SRI NIWAS DAS. Delhi: Sudadars Press, 1881.

A MONTH or two ago we called attention to the first novel written in the Hindi language, we now offer a short notice of an original play by the same author. In the present stage of development of Hindi the books which are produced consist almost exclusively of translations from books previously existing. We are well aware that bushels of original verse are annually printed, the greater part of which is not worth the paper on which the old, old subjects are reiterated with dreary monotony in the same old jingling rhymes. This is a survival which the practical requirements of modern life will gradually supersede. Of course among a people so eminently poetic as Indians are, poems of exceptional merit occasionally appear. The recent Hindi version of the Megha-Dūta, by Rāja Lachhman Singh, is of this limited number. The appearance of a really original book in prose is, therefore, an indication of healthy development, deserving special mention. Sri Niwas Das is a man of cultivated intellect and wide reading; and, as a consequence he writes with freedom and propriety. His play appears to us a more finished performance than his novel; but both of them are of rare value to the student of Hindi from the circumstance that the Author writes in the actual vernacular of his district, instead of resorting to artificial literary diction. While the mass of the book is in colloquial Hindi, the author illustrates the curious mixture of dialects in Northern India, by making one of his characters speak Urdū, another speak Braj Bhāshā, and a third Marwari. His book is thus of uncommon interest to students of the modern Aryan languages of India. It is to be hoped that this facile writer will add more such books to his country's literature, and that other Hindus will emulate his good example by endeavouring to cultivate Hindi more by the care with which they form their sentences, the attention they give to excellence in details, and to the refinement of the ideas imparted, than to futile attempts to bedizen commonplace notions with grand words borrowed from the ancient classics of India.

Prachīn Itihas. A Manual of Ancient History. By BHAI GUR-MUKHI SINGH. Lahore, 1881.

THIS is a good-sized book of 360 pages, carrying the history of ancient nations from the most remote times up to the end of the Greek period, the last event recorded being dated A.D. 69. The book ends abruptly in the middle of an unfinished sentence, so that, at some future time, a continuation may be expected. It was published for the practical purpose of imparting some notions of ancient history to Indians reading up for degrees. The information it contains is, therefore, derived from European sources, and requires no remark from us. We are, however, pleased to note the intellectual development which the publication of these books marks, and the conscientious care which their authors give to their production. Each of such books imparts additional flexibility to the Hindi language by adapting it to the expression of new ideas.

EDUCATION IN THE PUNJAB.*

THE report that has been issued this year by the Director of Public Instruction in the Punjab deserves notice, both on account of the special matter it contains, and also because it may be taken as a final pleading on behalf of the educational system which it is the task of Dr. Hunter's commission to investigate and report upon. The director points with satisfaction to the fact that there are now 2089 schools under his surveillance, with upwards of 110,000 pupils; and that nearly 16 lakhs of rupees have been spent upon these institutions during the year. Taken by itself such a statement seems fairly satisfactory; but the remarks of the Lieutenant Governor of the Punjab, which accompany the report, show that in the opinion of that officer at least, there is small cause for gratification, because of the little that has been done for elementary education. The Director of Public Instruction declares it to be his opinion that his department was not created for the spread of primary education, and candidly avows that his main endeavour has been to extend the middle and high schools. In so doing he conceives that he has been carrying out the principle of the various education despatches; but, oddly enough, admits that it was the intention of Lord Lawrence's policy to give a school to every village. On this point the Lieutenant Governor remarks that less money (in proportion to the education grant) is spent in the Punjab on primary education than in any other province in India; that only half per cent. of the population is under instruction in Government and Aided Schools; and that only one such school exists for every 26½ villages in the Punjab. This he considers very far from a due execution of the spirit of the despatches, and gives it as his opinion that the Director's attitude in this respect is "one of too much passivity." There seems a fair amount of evidence to support this opinion of the Lieutenant Governor, for the Director evidently looks with contempt upon indigenous schools, and, as a matter of fact, has almost completely ignored them. Another officer in the Punjab, however, has named no less than 6,362 indigenous schools, with 86,023 pupils, which are carrying on their useful work silently,—unknown, unhelped, and unrecognised in any way by the Department. In adverting to this fact, the Lieutenant Governor with justice exclaims that "a wide field here exists for work in the cause of education." The reason assigned for ignoring this vast educational machinery is that, in their present condition, these schools are inefficient, although the Director states in one paragraph that, in some of these indigenous schools, the pupils "obtained at least a considerable knowledge of Persian literature." But, as the Lieutenant * "Report on the State of Education in the Punjab and its Dependencies, for the year 1881-82." By Lieut. Col. W. R. M. HOLROYD, B.S.C., Director of Public Instruction, Punjab. Lahore, 1882.

Governor keenly remarks, the present inefficiency of these schools, so far from being a reason for ignoring them, is the best reason for endeavouring to improve their condition. Another feeble excuse of the Director is that the Department could not take over all these schools; yet he boasts that the majority of the Persian schools, which he considers the best among them, have been so absorbed. The Punjab Government, however, differs from the Director on this point also; for the Lieutenant Governor remarks that he is "very strongly opposed" to the principle of absorbing indigenous schools, and considers it to be "to the last degree objectionable" to cast the whole education of the country in one mould. The truth seems to be that the Director takes too easy a view of his duties. He is very much departmental, being satisfied with the administration of the system of which he is the head, without endeavouring to improve, enlarge, and adapt it to the growing requirements of the people. After reading such a report as the one before us it is easy to understand the outcry which has recently been made for some real efforts to give education to the people in return for the money which they pay for it.

There is a paragraph in the comments of the Lieutenant Governor upon the Report which calls for particular notice, because it shows that the Punjab Government have conceived the idea that an undesirable amount of activity has been manifested by the Director of Public Instruction in one direction. The Director is called upon to submit a special report upon the Government Book Depot; he is to state its origin, organisation, operations, and financial results, with special reference to its bearing a private enterprise in the book trade. It is well known that the supply of school-books to a province is a very lucrative undertaking, because of the tens of thousands of copies of books required. Not unnaturally such a field for enterprise is an object of desire among publishers, who eagerly strive with each other to produce books likely to win the approbation of the dispensers of such wholesale patronage. The Punjab has, however, been practically closed against this healthy competition by the operation of the Book Depot which the Lieutenant Governor seeks to have explained. The most startling feature in this affair, is that the Director of Public Instruction himself has occupied the market, by preparing a series of school-books, which in his official character, and even as President of the School-Book Committee, he is able to introduce into whatever schools he pleases. We should have hesitated to comment on this subject had not the Director of Public Instruction himself admitted that he was engaged in the trade. In his Report for 1877-78, page 8, part 8, he informs the Government that he has been engaged in a series of experiments in photo-zincography, that he has printed three books, and handed them over to "the Secretary of the School of Carpentry, and any profits that might be realised would be credited to that Institution." The words "might" and "would" read very awkwardly in this sentence, and give to the statement the character of a confession. The report from which it is quoted goes on to state that a First and Second Reader had also been produced by him, "and introduced, with the sanction of the Government, into the Government schools of the province." These books had been supplied "to the Book Depot at a rate which admitted of a suitable profit to the Depot;" and, as if to make the nature of the transaction perfectly clear, comes the statement—"the risk of publication was borne by myself; and it was intended, if any profit should accrue to me, to devote it, after obtaining the sanction of Government, to some object connected with education." Here, again, we learn that something "was intended," intimating that, in the document quoted, we are dealing with an ex post facto explanation. And then we read that "some other books have been published at my risk, and numerous experiments have been made."

There being, then, no dispute as to the facts, we have only to inquire whether it was a philanthropic or a profitable transaction; and whether it is a desirable operation for a Director of Public Instruction to be engaged in. Touching the first point, the Director again comes to our aid with the remark—"I can take no credit to myself for the expenditure I have incurred, as I did not anticipate that my experiments would involve any ultimate loss." Clearly, then, it was considered a safe investment; and a few figures will demonstrate that there was good ground for this opinion. Let us take the First Reading Book as a sample. The pages of this book measure 36 square inches, and it consists of 32 pages; at the ordinary price for producing photo-zincographic plates, the cost of the plates in question will be £28 16s. To produce 10,000 copies from these plates, the paper, printing, folding, and stitching would make the total cost of the first 10,000 amount to £56 6s. or 1½d. per copy. The selling price is 2 annas, or 3d., thus leaving a margin of 1½d., or more than 50 per cent. for trade allowance and profit. The allowance made to Government is 20 per cent. on retail prices; therefore the retail price of 10,000 copies at 3d. each being £125, 20 per cent. reduction leaves £100 as the amount received for books which, we have just seen, could not have cost more than £56 6s.; being a handsome profit of £43 14s., or 80 per cent., on the first 10,000 copies. But it must be remembered that the plates are bought only once; therefore, from the second, and every subsequent 10,000, no less than £28 16s. must be deducted from the cost; thus making the cost of every 10,000 after the first amount to no more than £27 10s., and the profit on the £100 at which they sell, £72 10s., or more than 250 per cent. profit! No less than 67,000 copies of this book were sold last year alone; but taking the average sales at 60,000 copies per annum, there must be a comfortable profit of £435 a year arising from the sale of this little book alone to solace the enterprising man who "took the risk of publication" on himself.

The Second Reading Book is not far behind the First in profit. It contains 48 pages; the cost of the plates being £43 4s., and the cost of paper, printing, and folding being £43 15s.; making £86 19s., or less than 2d. per copy. The selling price is 4½d., giving 100 per cent. profit on the first 10,000; and no less than 200 per cent. on every subsequent 10,000. Of this book between 20,000 and 30,000 copies are disposed of annually, yielding upwards of £200 profit; thus the First and Second Books together produce a revenue of £600 or £700 a year to divide among those concerned in the printing and publishing of them. The prices quoted in the above calculations are not wild statements or guess-work assertions; they are deliberate quotations of actual prices, with full knowledge of the nature of the work. The cost of the original manuscript is purposely omitted, because a manuscript has to be provided for any book, although for photographic purposes more care is certainly required in its preparation; but, as the director observed in his report, "the expenditure incurred in obtaining a good manuscript in the first instance is a matter of small importance."

The foregoing is sufficient to show that somebody must be reaping a good harvest out of a series of books which the Director acknowledges to be his children, even if he does not share in the profit. We cannot feel surprised that the Lieutenant Governor of the Punjab should direct an investigation into the working of the Book Depot. It seems clear that the Director's anxiety in the matter of books, has got him into an anomalous position. He has produced books as an individual, which, as President of the School-Book Committee, he is naturally disposed to recommend, and, as Director of Public Instruction, to approve. The "Government," whatever that may mean, then introduces them into schools, and thus practically closes the market to the general publishing trade. It is fairly open to question whether this can be for the good of the province. The Lieutenant Governor for one frankly expresses his "doubts whether the maintenance of such an institution (as the Book Depot) on its present footing, is consistent with the policy of encouraging private enterprise."

CORRESPONDENCE.

OUR INDIAN STEWARDSHIP.

SIR,—In the Nineteenth Century for this month you will find an interesting article by Miss Florence Nightingale, in which that lady endeavours to defend Lord Ripon.

In page 331, she writes:—

"The change from the Company to the Crown, though in many respects a mere change of name, has had a mischievous effect in lulling the wholesome jealousy and watchfulness of our public men in England, so that people are apt to indulge in a careless optimism, trusting that all is well, and that our great official hierarchy is administering India with singleness of heart for the good of the people, unswayed by personal interests, or by the prejudices of class and race."

In page 337, Miss Nightingale urges that one of the chief grounds of complaint against British Administration is the great cost met by excessive taxation.

Lord Ripon's measures will have no effect in decreasing taxation; our foolish system of active extortion, which was abolished by the East India Company, but restored under Her Majesty's Government, will be extended and left without check. Lord Ripon's ideas of Municipal Government in India will only create a hankering after the negotiations of loans, and for throwing taxation from off the shoulders of municipal councillors on to those of active paying labourers. The idea of delighting the native community by authorising native magistrates to try Europeans and to sentence them to fines and imprisonment has nothing whatever to do with the substitution of good native judges in the place of young, ignorant, inexperienced Europeans.

Lord Ripon's idea of self-government have no sort of similitude to local government by Rajpoot communities. We have by our own measures incapacitated ourselves for returning to the ancient order of things. Imbued with fallacies regarding free trade in land, we have destroyed Rajpoot self-government, and by the encouragement of auction sales of Rajpoot lands, have introduced hornets into bee-hives. We can no more restore the ancient order of things than we can restore a porcelain vase which has been foolishly dashed into pieces.

If Miss Nightingale would only study the histories which describe in official language how knaves have year after year been purchasing cheaply the rights of the ancient Rajpoot land proprietors, she would learn how hopeless it is to expect good self-government for communes under the influence of these knaves and of their heirs.—Your obedient servant,

THE OFFICIAL OPINIONS ON THE ILBERT BILL.

A FEELING of irritation, not unnatural in the light of recent experience, is growing up at the silence of the Government of India regarding the result of the official opinions on the Criminal Procedure Jurisdiction Bill.

Such a feeling is, perhaps, a little premature, seeing that the time that has elapsed since the whole of the opinions were received by the Government of India has been hardly sufficient for the purpose of printing the somewhat voluminous Blue-book they may be expected to form. Nevertheless, owing in part to a very general impression having got abroad that June 15 was the date fixed for the submission of the reports by the Local Governments, such a feeling exists, and the Government of India will do wisely to allay it by publishing the reports as soon as possible.

Unnecessary delay in adopting this course will be inevitably interpreted as not only corroborating the prevailing belief, that the immense majority and weight of the opinions received is against proceeding with the Bill,—that would be of small consequence,—but as indicating that the Government harbours the intention of disregarding the verdict which it voluntarily challenged, and by the result of which it publicly pledged itself to shape its course. The suspicions of the public will, indeed, go further than this. In view of the imminent prorogation of Parliament, it will be generally inferred that the chief motive of the delay is to prevent the publication of the opinions from exercising on the minds of that body an influence which the Government conceives would be inimical, if not fatal, to the course of action it has decided to take. Such a stratagem would, it is true, be equally short-sighted and futile. For, if the result of the official opinions is what it is generally understood to be, no Secretary of State would incur, or be permitted by his colleagues to incur, the tremendous responsibility of disregarding it, the more especially that, in so doing, he would also be acting counter to the advice of his own Council and to a mass of publicly expressed opinion at home, stronger than has ever before declared itself on any Indian question. Still, the present Government of India has recently treated the world to an exhibition of short-sightedness so closely parallel to that which we are now contemplating, that the public can hardly be expected to credit it with the wisdom of shaping its conduct according to its ultimate rather than its proximate results.

No thing could be more unfortunate at the present moment than the adoption by the Government of a course which, while certain to add to its ultimate humiliation, would in the meantime destroy still more completely the confidence of the European public in its honesty and prudence, and provoke demonstrations pregnant with political embarrassment, if not danger.

It need scarcely be added that, in the face of past experience of the editing and summarising qualifications of the Government of India, no mere precis of the official opinions submitted,—nothing less than the ipsissima verba of the reporting officers,—can be expected to satisfy the public, or will be accepted by them as an honest fulfilment of the implied conditions of the pledge given in February, and ratified in March, last. The Government may weigh opinions, if it pleases, and is, no doubt, justified in doing so. But the public have a right to know in what manner of scales the process is performed, and on what principle the weights are made up. In other words, they have a right to know what and whose the opinions are; and any attempt at concealment will admit of but one interpretation.

Vehement as the late agitation was, it was very much modified by the knowledge that the Government had to call for the opinions of its officers before proceeding further with the Bill, and to be guided by the result; but in proportion as it was modified by this cause, it will be exacerbated if it should be discovered, or believed, that Government has made up its mind to evade or to repudiate the test to which it thus appealed.—Englishman, July 23.

A MARATHA BRAHMAN AND THE "INDU PRAKAS" ON THE PROSPECTS OF INDIAN INDEPENDENCE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "INDU-PRAKAS."

SIR,—In your views of Prof. Wordsworth's admirable letters on British Indian policy occurs the sentence, "Those who dream of the period when India will be free from 'foreign yoke,' and will be fit to be governed by her own people, indulge in a speculation which is as wild as it is unprofitable." This proposition struck many of us here in the Deccan with much surprise. Such a proposition, no public writer in the Deccan would ever venture to make even in a fourth-rate country paper. We have not yet descended so low as to lose all touch of our ancestry, of the glorious traditions and history of our country, and of the times when Raja Raghu and Raja Ramachandra, Raja Dharm and Raja Vikram ruled a prosperous, happy, and contented people. By the punya of our forefathers, we still love these great and dear names, and their lives and deeds are still familiar to our daughters and sisters. Perhaps in the hybrid and bania atmosphere of Bombay these names are unknown and forgotten. But in the Deccan the days of our national independence are still remembered. Truly we have lost that independence, since the tremendous wave of barlatic force, which overwhelmed our country about the tenth century of the Christian era. But we had nearly regained it, and there are among us men, who in their boyhood breathed the free air of national independence.

2. That at present the country has not the elements which constitute "a nation," and that we are not yet fit to rule our country is a self-evident truth or fact. But because this country is composed of many races differing in language, customs, and manners, it has small chance of being ever able to govern itself is an assertion belied by past as well as present history. India was in ancient times governed by its native kings, in subordination to a paramount king—a Rajadhiraj.

The instance of the Great American Republic, where there are many races and languages, but who are all bound together by a common religion, forming a federal nation, clearly stands out as a practical model, which the people of this country (provided they have not forgotten that they are men like their rulers and not an inferior race of beings) may well copy. British statesmen, like Mr. Bright, view such a contingency quite possible, may very likely. Excepting the Indian Mohammedans, all the races of this country are bound together by a common religion, by common traditions, and a common national literature. Education is needed, of course, to bring them yet closer together, and our present rulers (what ever their shortcomings) are earning the eternal gratitude of a great nation by nobly, generously, and unreservedly bestowing it on it. As well observed by an able writer in the course of an article in the last number of the Poona Sarvajanic Sabha's Quarterly "the ægis of British protection is an acknowledged necessity, and none feels its need with greater emphasis than the leaders of native thought." "But," the same writer continues, "there can be no question that a nation of 250 million of people can never be permanently held down by sheer force, and sooner or later in God's Providence, and under the encouragement of British example and discipline, the people of this country must rise to the status of a self-governed community, and learn to control their own affairs in subordinate alliance with England."

3. We all of us have come to look upon the learned principal of our chief college, as our guide, philosopher, and friend. He is universally respected and loved by all the natives. I do not know among the Englishmen in this country his equal in learning, especially historical reading, and in the breadth and liberality of his views. But even Mr. Principal Wordsworth, where he took to the study of our ancient history and literature, would admit that a people who produced a Ramchandra and a Janak, a Shivaji, a Mahadji, a Madhavarao, and a Nana Fadenvis, cannot be altogether wanting in the art of government and in men able to govern and guide the destinies of a free and independent nation.

4. In the concluding portion of your review you lay down the dictum, "given a good and impartial rule, it does not matter in the least to them (the people of India) whether it is foreign or not." This is a most untrue and unnatural dictum, or to put it more tenderly, "something less than what reason would dictate." The people of India are not such slavish creatures as you assume them to be. I do not believe your dictum can be true of any people on the face of the globe. Certainly men cannot be divided into two species—one created to rule, and the other to serve. All men are born free, but a people, who, at a given time and place, happen to possess some advantage in energy, organisation, honour, &c., over other races, become, for the time being and only while the advantage lasts, a dominant and ruling race. The people of this country had their days of superiority and dominance, not many years since, and the torch of freedom, though it now glimmers before the dawn of superior light, is most certainly destined, under the rule of a people pre-eminent for their love of, and sympathy with, freedom, to revive and shed a glorious lustre over the land.

A MARATHA BRAHMAN.

We have already observed that the question, which our correspondent discusses in the foregoing letter, is not of any practical interest at the present moment, nor will it be so for many years to come. We must state, however, that our correspondent has misunderstood us on some points. In saying that so long as the rulers in India are impartial, the people do not care whether they are foreign or not, we did not mean to imply that the people were disposed to be slavish. However, it is no use discussing a matter, that is of no practical concern at present.—[Ed. I. P.]

The native officials consulted are divided in their opinions. The idea, we believe, has been suggested to the Government, but it seems the proposal has not advanced far towards acceptance. The advantages of the proposal are two-fold. Those portions of the Government offices which would remain up at Simla would be relieved of the heavy rent charges which house proprietors and lodging house keepers appear to have made up their minds to demand during the coming season. At the same time available accommodation would be increased by the withdrawal of so much competition."

THE INDIAN WHEAT TRADE.—The gigantic strides which the Indian wheat trade has made during the past few years is attracting considerable attention in Australia, and the colonists are beginning to fear that the Indian trade may ultimately result in driving the Australian cereal out of the English market. A writer in a recent number of the Melbourne Argus, after drawing attention to the vast facilities for the production of cheap wheat which India possesses in her wide expanses of fertile agricultural land and her unrivalled supplies of cheap labour, expresses an opinion that if railway charges are reduced so as "to place Indian growers on a footing of equality with those of the United States in every particular, except the item of freight from New York and the other Eastern shipping ports, we may expect to see the wheats of Hindustan supplying a steadily increasing proportion of the English demand, and lower average prices ruling in the English markets than any that have yet been reached." When the cost of transport has been reduced the area under wheat cultivation will be immensely increased, and improved methods of tillage will result in a larger average yield. Altogether the Indian grain trade has a great future in store, and we may expect to hear many alarming notes, such as that sounded by the Argus, before the trade has reached the height of its prosperity.—Times of India.

ALLEN'S INDIAN MAIL.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL AND THE OUTRAGES
ON ENGLISHWOMEN IN CALCUTTA.

THE extraordinarily unfair tactics by which the supporters of the Ilbert Bill are defending the criminal resolution of Mr. Gladstone's Government to persevere with this iniquitous measure must surely sooner or later bring upon them the indignant contempt of the British public. From the time of the imposture of the "cooked telegram," that purported to be a "Reuter" and was really an official concoction, paid for by Lord Ripon—an imposture that was only discovered by the merest accident—the opponents of the Bill have had to complain of incessant misrepresentation and sharp practice. We have already adverted more than once to the monstrous perversion of Sir Alexander Arbuthnot's reference to the Calcutta outrages, that was given currency to by Lord Kimberley's remarks in reply to the Anglo-Indian deputation. The obvious, the only possible, meaning of Sir A. Arbuthnot's reference was, that these outrages, unparalleled since the Mutiny, afford a clear proof of the terrible exacerbation of race-antagonism, and the decline of English prestige, wrought by Lord Ripon's vanity and folly. To affect to treat the reference as meaning that respectable Native Magistrates would be likely to have any sympathy with such brutal outrages, was in itself an outrage on the common-sense of the reader, and would have done no harm—provided that Sir Alexander Arbuthnot's words, as well as those of Lord Kimberley, were both placed impartially before the reader; but unfortunately, as we have shown, in the report sent round to the provincial press, Lord Kimberley's words were given, but Sir Alexander Arbuthnot's were not.

We regret to observe that the very same subject has been made the occasion, in the House of Commons, of a misrepresentation even more flagrant. Sir George Campbell, in a speech characterised by the most virulent party-spite, and by the worst possible taste in speaking ill of his opponents, thus spoke of these deplorable outrages:—

"They were told of telegrams that had been received describing outrages that had been committed on European women. It was now six weeks or two months since those telegrams arrived, and he had searched the Indian papers for some substantiation of them and had utterly failed to find any."

Now, Sir George Campbell's speech will, of course, be widely reported. Moreover, it is well-known that he was Lieutenant Governor of Bengal, and he will naturally be credited with having the best information of what is passing in Calcutta. And he has the audacity to state, in his place in Parliament, that he has "searched the Indian papers," and "utterly failed" to find any substantiation of the telegrams about the outrages! What are the facts, as known to all our readers who see any Calcutta papers? Why, we dare to say it would be impossible to find any Calcutta paper that does not treat of the dreadful case of Mrs. Hume as a thing absolutely familiar to all its readers! We have ourselves extracted, from time to time, articles and paragraphs upon it from Native as well as from English papers. In the Native print called Reis and Rayyet of July 28, to hand by the mail that arrived just before Sir George Campbell's speech, we find this paragraph:—

"The next or the fourth Criminal Sessions of the Calcutta High Court commences next Monday, Mr. Justice O'Kinealy presiding. The board is not a heavy one, and it includes the sensational case of Mrs. Hume v. the Mehter."

And for the subsequent case, in the Pioneer that arrived by the same mail (Sir George Campbell will hardly tell us that a "search" in the Indian papers did not include the Pioneer—and even if it did not, we may add that most of the other Indian papers contained similar references), we find the following account of the outrage in Mr. Justice Norris's house:—

"A feeling of deep indignation has been aroused, and is unquestionably prevalent, among Europeans in this city in connection with the recent case of attempted criminal assault on a young English lady, to which the Englishman is responsible for referring in its issue of the 17th instant. Endeavours—doomed from the first—to keep the occurrence profoundly secret, have signally failed, and the matter is to-day such an open secret—names being freely mentioned—that I now venture to refer to it with some degree of candour. The occurrence took place early on the morning of Friday last, in a room on the ground-floor of a house a few hundred yards south from Park Street, in occupation at present by a Judge of the High Court, who unfortunately, but naturally, has become an object of great aversion and antipathy to Lord Macaulay's friends—the Bengalis—in connection with the recent commitment of Surendra Nath Banerji to the Presidency Gaol for contempt of the High Court. Ever since Surendra Nath Banerji's commitment the learned Judge to whom I refer has been constantly annoyed with anonymous letters couched in the most offensive language, and many of them containing dire threats of vengeance in re Banerji against his lordship, offering him the grossest insults, promising him an early death, and so on. One letter, received by his lordship in the High Court the other morning, indicated to him that an early opportunity would be taken by its courageous Bengali writer and his allies of cutting up his lordship into eighty pieces! Not only have threats of personal injury been uttered against the Judge I allude to, but he has been informed, I believe by letter, that outrages similar to that attempted upon the wife of the Public Prosecutor here some time ago would be committed on the ladies of his household, and the revelation of the foiled villany of last Friday morning seems to be that an attempt to carry out one of these cowardly and blackguard threats of insult combined with injury has now been made. The circumstances of last Friday morning's occurrence it is unnecessary to detail, but there is great reason to suppose that the attempt was committed by some low caste native paid to commit the villainy. Owing to the precaution which the villain took on entering the lady's room of putting out the light, no one saw his face before his precipitate flight; and although efforts are being made to trace the scoundrel, under the direction of the Deputy Commissioner of Police, Mr. H. G. Wilkins, there is next to no prospect of the rascal ever being caught. I may say that the present indignation is much greater than that which was aroused by the attempted assault on the wife of the Public Prosecutor for several reasons, one being that in the last case of assault the indications are clearer that the offence was instigated by men who have at least so far been educated as to be able to write anonymous letters. One or two more instances of occurrences similar to that which took place in Hungerford-street last Friday morning will cause, in all probability, such a storm of indignation and ill feeling amongst Europeans that serious results may be expected to follow. Secretly planned assaults on defenceless European ladies by paid villains certainly cannot be tolerated."

The opponents of the Bill would not have complained if Sir George Campbell had argued that the outrages have had nothing to do, in their origin, with the Ilbert Bill, and that it is purely a coincidence that they should happen just now, and two of them should happen in the houses of Mr. Justice Norris and the Public Prosecutor. The Native papers are unanimous in maintaining this position; and it was of course open to Sir George Campbell to take this view, in what after all must be a matter of opinion. But for Sir George Campbell to state publicly in Parliament, in a speech certain to be widely circulated, that the Indian papers have not substantiated the telegrams about the outrage on Mrs. Hume, is—well, simply “a staggerer.” And in addition to these two causes célèbres, we should like to ask whether Sir George Campbell’s “search” failed to find in any Indian paper the judgment in the Jhelum case? It was reproduced in every Indian paper that came under our own observation, and was transferred to our pages.

We do not doubt that Sir George Campbell fancied he had searched the Indian papers for the substantiation of the telegrams, and that he fancied that he had “utterly failed to find any.” But is this the kind of accuracy that we have a right to look for, in those whose Parliamentary position gives them opportunities of guiding public opinion?

OBITUARY.—It is with sincere regret that we record the death of T. W. H. Tolbort, Esq., of the Bengal Civil Service, who succumbed to a severe attack of bronchitis and debility, at Dorchester, on the 4th inst. The deceased gentleman was a man of rare energy, tact, and knowledge; and brought himself to an early death at the age of 41, by the passionate earnestness with which he laboured while Deputy Commissioner at Umballa. Originally a chemist's assistant, he applied himself to acquire the knowledge necessary to win a place in the Civil Service of India; and achieved the distinction of passing first among those who completed with him. Continued diligence gave him the rare honour of passing first also at the Final Examination, after the enforced two years of probation. Besides his knowledge of the vernaculars he was an accomplished Persian scholar, and published a translation of "Robinson Crusoe" in that language in the Roman character. He also published a version of the first half of the "Arabian Nights" in Urdu also in the Roman character. He was, indeed, an energetic advocate of the Roman character, believing it to be the means by which education might be disseminated far and wide in India. Just before starting on his last visit to India he told the writer that he would devote his life to that cause. In

INDIAN MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

(From the Bombay Gazette.)

Brigadier General C. J. East assumed command of the Sialkote Brigade on Aug. 1.

Sir F. Roberts, accompanied by Colonel Campbell Stewart, returned to Ootacamund on August 2.

The Duke of Connaught, in addition to the Commander in Chief in India and the Commander in Chief of Bombay, is expected to be present at the Bangalore camp of exercise. It is also probable, a local paper says, that representatives of the Armies from the Bengal and Bombay Presidencies, as well as from the N. W. P., and Burmah, will be present.

Lieutenant-Colonel Morton has been appointed to officiate as Assistant Adjutant General, Oudh Division, vice Farrington, on furlough, and will be succeeded as Deputy Assistant Adjutant-General, Rohilkund District, by Major Brind, Connaught Rangers.

Sixty days' privilege leave of absence is granted to Colonel O. R. Stokes, commanding Royal Artillery, Allahabad Division, from 16th August.

Lieutenant Colonel C.A.E.S. Carter, Acting Controller of Military Accounts, Madras, proceeds to England on three months' privilege leave. Major C. J. Durand, the Pay Examiner, will perform the duties of Colonel Carter's office in the mean time.

Lieutenant Colonel R. F. Angelo, Bengal Staff Corps, has sent in his papers to retire.

Lieutenant Colonel Wauchope, 26th Bengal N.I., officiates as commandant, 14th Sikhs, vice Williams on furlough.

Major Hubbersty, Royal Irish Fusiliers, has been granted six months' leave on medical certificate.

Sixty days' privilege leave of absence, from August 17, has been granted to Major P. D. Jeffreys, brigade major, Allahabad.

Major A. E. Brind, of the Connaught Rangers, who has been appointed Deputy Assistant Adjutant General of the Rohilkund District, officiated for over two years as Brigade Major at Multan, during the time his battalion was stationed there, and whilst Major Fitzgerald, the permanent incumbent, was stationed at Quetta.

Captain J. Menteith Brebner has been elected Commandant of the Calcutta Naval Artillery Volunteers.

Captain Frederick Charles Napier Goldney, 43rd Regiment, Assam Native Infantry, has proceeded on four months' leave from Calcutta, under the regulations of 1875.

Capt. F. W. Campbell, R.A., who went home last year for the long course of gunnery at Shoeburyness, has been appointed to the Department of the Director of Artillery; and Capt. D. E. Dewar replaces him in the course at Shoeburyness.

Capt. F. M. Campbell is posted to 8-1 Battery Cinque Ports Division, in place of Capt. D. S. Dewar, placed on the seconded list.

The following postings are reported:—Lieutenant Colonels Shaw, V.C., and Wray, Royal Irish, both to the 1st Battalion, the former in command. Major Kennett and Captain Earle, South Yorkshire, to the 1st Battalion. Major Kennett is now adjutant of the 1st Durham Volunteer Rifle Corps. Captains Rawlins and Sheehan, Scottish Rifles, to the 2nd Battalion. Captain Forbes, Rifle Brigade, has been removed to the 4th Battalion. Lieutenant Blake, 2nd Scottish Rifles, has been attached to the 1st Battalion at home as a supernumerary, and comes out next trooping season. Lieutenant Heygate, 1st Border Regiment, remains in England on leave until September 15 next.

Lieutenant W. G. Alban, wing officer and officiating quartermaster of the 13th Bombay N.I., is transferred to the 5th N.L.I., as wing officer and adjutant, in succession to Lieutenant Seddon, whose unfortunate death by the violence of his Pathan servant was reported a short time since.

The Government of India has sanctioned the appointment of Sub Assistant Commissary General Lieut. H. R. Marrett as assistant to the superintendent of the Hissar Cattle Farm.

The appointment of Major Thomas, East Yorkshire Regiment, to succeed Colonel Gillespie as assistant adjutant general for musketry appeared in the last batch of Bombay General Orders, and will give general satisfaction. Major Thomas has been acting in the appointment since Lieutenant Colonel Wooldridge was appointed chief of the transport in this presidency, and the only doubt which was raised as to his being permanently appointed lay in the fact that he was not a Staff Corps officer. But we believe the understanding that was arrived at, when first the appointments of assistant adjutant generals for musketry were created, was that two were to be held by officers of the British service, and one by a Staff Corps officer. This distribution is not in any way disturbed by the appointment of Major Thomas to the chief musketry appointment, as Captain Wetherall, D.A.A.G. for Musketry at Belgaum, belongs to the Staff Corps, and Captain Nares, at Mhow, is in the British service. And there is no doubt that as assistant adjutant general for musketry of the Bombay Army, Major Thomas is the right man in the right place.

An Afghan dinner is to be given at Simla at Peliti's Rooms on the 1st September. Those who are desirous of joining should apply to General Sir Charles McGregor.

The following appointments have been made:—Major Michell, 14th N.I., to be second-in-command 13th N.I., vice Stevens, deceased; Lieutenant Walker, 40th N.I., to be wing officer on probation, 13th N.I.; Lieutenant Johnstone, Leinster Regiment, to the 5th Punjab Infantry, as probationer for the Staff Corps.

Captain Wynter, 14th Hussars is to be placed on probation for the Army Pay Department.

Captain Thomson, 1st Leinster has been appointed to the regimental depot at home.

Lieutenants Leygate, 1st Border, and Mackenzie, 1st Suffolk, on sick leave in England, have been attached to the 2nd Battalion of their regiments as supernumeraries and come out next trooping season.

Lieut. E. Bickford, No. 7 Battery, 1st Brigade, Scottish Division, has been appointed to No. 9 Mountain Battery, 1st Brigade, Cinque Ports Division.

H. A., from Umballa. The force altogether will consist of one brigade of cavalry, two brigades of infantry, and P-3, R. A.; and it will be assembled about December 12. At Rawul Pindi the camp will consist of D-A., R. H. A., King's Dragoon Guards (after December 20), 15th and 19th Bengal Cavalry, 2nd Battalion Wiltshire Regiment from Jhelum, a regiment from England; 1st Bengal Native Infantry, 21st Punjab Native Infantry, and 45th Sikhs from Jhelum—in all one brigade of cavalry and two of infantry—5-I., R. A., and 5-1 Southern Division R. A.

The camp of exercise at Umballa this winter will include such volunteer corps as can make it convenient to join. The Lahore paper remarks:—There are sundry small obstacles of the nature of expense to be overcome; but these, it is to be hoped, will be vigorously grappled with, as nothing can add more to the efficiency of volunteers than working all with regular troops.

The following relief of regiments of the Punjab Frontier Force will take place, the Allahabad paper says, during the winter of 1883-84:—The 1st Punjab Cavalry, from Dera Ismail Khan, to be divided between Kohat and Edwardesabad. The 2nd Punjab Cavalry, from Dera Ghazi Khan to Dera Ismail Khan. The 3rd Punjab Cavalry, from Edwardesabad and Kohat to Rajanpur. The 5th Punjab Cavalry from Rajanpur to Dera Ghazi Khan. The 1st Sikh Infantry, from Abbottabad to Dera Ismail Khan. The 2nd Sikh Infantry, from Kohat to Abbottabad. The 3rd Sikh Infantry, from Bannu to Kohat. The 4th Punjab Infantry, from Dera Ismail Khan to Dera Ghazi Khan. The 6th Punjab Infantry, from Kohat to Bannu. The dates of arrival and departure of the above regiments have not yet been announced.

We have received a specimen copy of what is quite a novelty in India. It is a newspaper called the Military Instructor, and it is described as "a weekly journal containing translations of military orders, regulations, &c., published by the permission of His Excellency the Commander in Chief." Its object is to circulate throughout the native army in the vernacular all general orders, circulars, &c., so that the sepoy may know everything that is going on. But this is not all. The enterprising originator of the paper hopes to be favoured by commanding officers with "copies of regimental orders, making minor promotions, as also the historical records of their regiments, with a view to their translations being inserted in the Military Instructor." Translations of books of drill, memos. of tactics, and other works of interest and utility to the native ranks will also appear in the new paper. In short, it seems to be the aim of the Military Instructor "to provide the native army with reading that shall be both instructing and interesting, and as in these days Jack Sepoy cannot get on unless he knows how to read, it is just as well that somebody is going to provide him with wholesome reading. The managing proprietor of the new weekly is Mr. Bhasker Ramchandra Sahasrabudhe, head-clerk in the office of the Assistant Adjutant-General, Puna Division, and we wish him every success in his venture. That a newspaper should be published in the interests of the sepoy is a sign of the time worth noting, and the idea is an excellent one if it can only be carried out successfully.

The appointment of Colonel Aylmer S. Cameron, V.C., of the King's Own Borderers, the command of the 2nd Battalion of which he held, to the Headquarters Staff at the Horse Guards, vice Colonel East, has given, or will give, an up-country paper notes, most unexpected promotion to Lieutenant Colonel Ramsay and Major Carwithen, both of the 1st Battalion in this country, the former obtaining command of the battalion at home, and the latter his lieutenant colonelcy in the battalion at Umballa. Both these officers entered the service in 1857 within four months of each other, and have served in the Borderers the whole time. Colonel Cameron was employed in India on the Garrison Instructor Staff from 1871 (September) till July 1876, during six months of which he officiated as Superintendent, and was a Chief Instructor for the last two years. Lieutenant Colonel Ramsay and Major Carwithen served with the Peshawur Valley Field Force in 1878-79. The command of the 1st Battalion, King's Own Borderers, on the 21st June year after next, when Colonel Harvey will have completed his five years in command, will now fall to Lieutenant-Colonel C. E. Hope, who entered the service in 1854, three years before Lieutenant Colonel Ramsay, his promotion being less rapid owing to his having exchanged with the King's Own Borderers for the 7th Fusiliers in 1864; he, however, commenced his career in the 10th Foot. Although of longer service, still he is a year and a half younger than Colonel Ramsay, who will be forty-eight next December.

A great decrease has taken place in the consumption of rum and beer in this country by the European soldiers, with a correspondent spread of sobriety among the rank and file. Curiously enough, while rum has lost much of its popularity in the canteen, beer has not taken its place; our boy-soldiers are really very moderate drinkers indeed. Thus in the year 1877-78 the total consumption of rum among British troops in India was 253,254 gallons; in 1881-82 it had fallen to 149,801 gallons. Comparing the same year as regards beer-drinking, we find that the figures are respectively 76,942 and 74,748 hogsheads.

The Government have sanctioned the temporary continuance of the family pension advantages to the heirs of such of the native troops and followers as may die while on service in the Quetta District, the Pioneer states. The abrogation of this privilege a short time back was the subject of much complaint in Bombay, and the present decision of the Government will give proportionate satisfaction.

A SOLDIER CHARGED WITH WOUNDING A COMRADE.—At a district court-martial, held at Ferozepore on the 3rd and 5th July, 1883, Private E. Linklater, 4th Battalion King's Royal Rifles, was charged with committing a civil offence, that is to say, wounding with intent to do grievous bodily harm, in that, at Ferozepore on the 1st June, 1883, he feloniously, unlawfully, and maliciously wounded Private Anthony O'Donnel, with intent in so doing to do some grievous bodily harm thereby. The prisoner was found guilty of the charge, and sentenced to be imprisoned with hard labour for two years. The sentence has been confirmed by Major General R. Hume, C.B., commanding Lahore Division, who has remitted one year of the imprisonment awarded, on account of the prisoner's previous good character, and in the absence of evidence of premeditation, the serious crime of which the prisoner has been convicted having resulted from sudden passion under considerable provocation.—Civil and Military Gazette.

DECORATED OFFICERS OF THE MADRAS ARMY.—The number of officers of the Madras Army who, according to the latest published accounts, have received the decorations of the Bath, the Star of India, &c., appears to be as follows:—Military Knights Commanders of the Bath, one; Military Companions, nine. Military Knights Grand Cross, Civil Knights Commanders, and Civil Companions, none. The Star of India—Knights Grand Commanders and Knights Commanders, none. Companions, six, which, however, must be reduced by one owing to the lamented death of Col. Drever. Of the Order of the Indian Empire there are four Companions, which seems to be the only grade in the Order. Of officers decorated with the Victoria Cross there is only one, viz., Colonel Prendergast, of the Royal Engineers. Six officers of the Madras Army have received Turkish decorations, viz., four that of the Imperial Order of the Medjidie, and two that of the Osmanieh. The orders of the Garter, the Thistle, and St. Patrick appear to have no representatives in the Madras Army, and the same may be said of the foreign orders of the Crescent and St. Ferdinand; nor are there any knights bachelors in the ranks of the old Coast Army.—Madras Times.

THE VOICE OF INDIA. A NEW MAGAZINE INTENDED TO GIVE EXPRESSION TO THE PUBLIC OPINION OF INDIA.

THERE are in England large classes willing and anxious to do justice to India but they find it very difficult to know how to act. They complain that Indian questions are intricate; that the opinions of official experts are contradictory; and that the people of India are dumb, and do not give expression to their needs. This defect it is now desired to remedy, by publishing monthly in Bombay a magazine somewhat similar in nature to Public Opinion in England, which will provide a compendium of all that is most valuable in the native journals throughout India on the leading topics of the day. It is hoped that the Voice of India will thus give forth a clear sound, interpreting between the rulers and the ruled, and making known the true wishes and feelings of the Indian people.

The Magazine will advocate no views of its own. It will seek only to reflect with care and accuracy the views set forth in the native press. The Indian people are naturally docile and conservative; and it is believed that the writings thus brought before the English public will be found to be characterised by a knowledge of facts, and generally by practical good sense and moderation. No doubt grievances will from time to time be set forth; but it is a policy of prudence no less than of justice to give these grievances a fair constitutional hearing. Accordingly, it is hoped that this publication will be welcomed by all Members of Parliament desirous of dealing with Indian questions, and that the facts thus brought together in a convenient form will be of value to journalists and other public writers. It is specially desired to bring the Magazine before the public in clubs, reading-rooms, libraries, and institutes throughout England, with a view to promote a sustained and intelligent interest in the welfare of our Indian Empire, comprising as it does 200 millions of our fellow-subjects.

A PLAIN STATEMENT ABOUT THE ILBERT BILL FOR ENGLISH READERS.

AT a time 'when so much controversy rages around what is known as the "Ilbert Bill," a little information about it may not be out of place.

The parties to the controversy are the Viceroy of India, and Her Majesty's European British subjects in that country.

Though few in numbers, the latter claim a hearing for two reasons.

The first is that the Viceroy is the aggressor, and wishes against their will to bind them as they were never bound before.

The second is that the proposed act against which they protest is aimed at them exclusively, and that the whole of those whom it will affect are united in protest.

What does the Viceroy propose doing? It is, in a few words, to bind, for the first time in history, the European British subjects of Her Majesty in the interior of India, to submit to be tried, on criminal charges by a Native of the country, provided he belong to the Covenanted Civil Service and get the power from Government. Europeans criminally accused have hitherto been able to claim a trial by one of their own countrymen. The right of making this claim is to be taken away.

Now, it is a wholesome English maxim that to invade any man's freedom, to bind him where he was not bound, is an evil in itself, justifiable only to remedy some greater evil. When this proposal was made thus to bind the Europeans under his care, it was the Viceroy's duty at once to inquire what was the existing evil to be remedied.

It might have been that there were not enough of Courts. But, even if Lord Ripon's prophecy that, many years hence, the natives in the Civil Service would be one-sixth of the whole, were to come true, there would still be one European member of the Service for every five or six European families in the part of the country to be effected by the Bill. All those who ought to know say that it will never be difficult to get a European man or woman tried by a European. In this very Bill too, provision is made for gradually abolishing many good and efficient courts—those presided over by Europeans outside the Civil Service.

It might have been that Europeans are unruly and unmanageable. There is the Viceroy's own testimony that they are orderly and law-abiding. It does not fall to one qualified magistrate out of five or six to try a case against a European once a year. They are well in hand, and it is not suggested that the control of natives will improve them.

These two considerations, viz., that there are plenty of Courts, and that Europeans are doing well as they are, ought to have proved to the Viceroy that the Bill was not needed, that there was no evil to be remedied.

But the Bill is to remedy injustice. Injustice to whom? It is said that for want of having Europeans bound to submit to trial by them, three or four natives now, and three or four score hereafter, will not be able to get promotion. It might be answered, "What if their promotion is stopped? Is an evil to be inflicted on many thousands, in order to remove an obstacle in the path of a few already fortunate ones?" But there is another answer. The want of this bond will not hinder their promotion. They can get the same pay, rank, and work, whether the Bill is passed or not. The trial of a European is so unusual an occurrence that it can easily be arranged for otherwise.

But it is said that if Europeans are not bound to submit to trial by them, a "slur" will be cast on them, and, through them, on all the people of India. What has that to do with it? No native ever had this dignity, and there can therefore be little slur in refusing it now to a few natives. The highest authorities are constantly declaring that there would be no slur. But if there be any slur, it does not lie in the mouth of the authors of this Bill to use it as an argument for the Bill. The same Bill which is to soothe the feelings of three or four natives now, and three or four score in the future, by declaring them eligible for appointment to try Europeans, insults (if there be any question of slur) the whole European community outside the Civil Service, by declaring its members for the first time ineligible, and retains the slur upon all the native communities in India except these few persons. The Bill is declared a final measure, so the slur on all, Europeans and natives, outside the Civil Service, is designed to be permanent. No one talked of "slur" in connection with this matter before; but now the blot has been seen, and recognised, and is to be allowed to remain.

The Bill asserts the equality of the European and the native in a double form. The native is as good as the European, and the European is no better than the native.

Inside the Civil Service the Europeans have always been trusted, and are to be a majority. Therefore the natives inside are to be levelled up, and trusted too. So Government officials are different flesh from the rest of mankind.

Outside the Service the natives have always been deeply distrusted, not only by the Government, but by one another. This is the most patent fact in all Indian administration. This fact has prevented the Government from following the English custom, though India is so poor a country, of appointing respectable natives as unpaid justices with power to try even natives. No native has power to try natives even, unless in the pay and under the strict control of Government, cut off from local interests, and moved about from place to place. To gratify his 250 million native subjects, the Viceroy professes—not confidence in them, but—distrust of Europeans. Among these natives whom it refuses to confide in are all the editors, associations, orators, nobles, and gentry of the country, including the fathers, brothers, heads of families, relatives, friends, and companions of those in whom it professes the most sublime confidence. This is the natural state of man, not redeemed by holding office.

But is not a native who is fit to try a native fit also to try a European? The Viceroy himself answers "No," for he permanently disqualifies numbers of native magistrates trusted to try natives. The Europeans tried to avoid the question by saying that, even if they were fit, their services are not needed. But if further pressed, they may answer that the fitness from one work does not follow from fitness for the other; they are utterly different. Then the question is asked "Europeans try natives; why not natives Europeans?" The Europeans might reasonably say that they prefer Europeans to natives, and Europeans are available. They might say that there are 250 million natives and not half as many thousand Europeans. Somebody must try the former, and Europeans are found to do it as well as natives with efficiency. The latter are so few in number and cases against them so few that the Europeans need no help. But further, a European magistrate trying a native has in his court native ministerial officers, a native bar, native police, and a native crowd. He is in the midst of native manners and customs. The Court language is the vernacular of the place. He has a long and varied experience of natives. The native magistrate trying a European has all these native surroundings which are strange to the European accused. The latter is probably utterly alone, disturbed in mind, and in trouble about nearly everything. The native magistrate is not familiar to him. The native magistrate has probably not been to England, and has not seen one European, for every hundred thousand natives the European magistrate has seen. The native has no knowledge of Europeans, and little means of gaining it. Granted equal intelligence, the European magistrate trying a native has enormous advantage over the native trying a European. With all this, native agitators say the European cannot try the native properly. With what force can they say that the native can try a European?

It was anticipated by the Viceroy when the Bill was first introduced that it would meet with no opposition. That was a mistake, and that the opposition was not factious perhaps reason has been given above to show. In order, however, that the dispute may not be conducted as in a debating society where nothing depends on the result, let the reader remember that this controversy is likely to affect the fortunes and lives of many good and honest men and women. Unfortunately if harm is done it is not likely to be sensational, so it will be all the worse to remedy.

Take, for instance, John Smith and his wife Jane. John is not a travelling M.P., or a sportsman out for the winter's shooting, or a great official on high pay. He is earning an honest living as a tea or coffee or indigo planter's assistant, a merchant's agent, a trader, or manufacturer, a driver, guard, or way-inspector on the railway, a tester or mechanic in a mill.

They have a prospect of many years of hard work before them, and cannot do much more than make both ends meet. John's duties take them out to live at a place far away from the presidency towns, out of reach of European neighbours, European barristers, newspapers, High Court. They have none but people of the country around them, it may be Burnese, Bengalis, Marattas, or others. These are in thousands. John does business with them; perhaps Jane keeps a stock of medicine and doctors them, and John decides their little disputes.

But John gives offence to some one, in one of hundreds of ways. It may be a neighbour with whom he has a land dispute, or who wants to get him out of the country as Shylock did Antonio; it may be a clerk whom he has caught embezzling, or a servant who has been stealing the horse's food, or carelessly giving bad water to him or Jane to drink (which means cholera), or a hand who has carelessly broken valuable machinery.

The offended person lays a plot. There are hundreds of persons available as witnesses, and as is done every day by natives against natives, a criminal case is concocted, made as plausible as possible, and probably rehearsed in action, both the act to be charged and the scene in Court, magistrate, witness, and bar all being represented. The complaint is laid, and John is summoned. If it is his busiest time, so much the better. The Court is not at his door. He has to go ten or twenty miles to Court. He will find no hotel, no lodgings, no suitable food or drink. He must take his food with him; and, anxious about his work and his wife, whom he has to leave unprotected, he has to set out. When he arrives at Court, he finds natives everywhere, all the understrappers, the police, the bar, and the crowd of idlers. He is a stranger, and alone. Perhaps there is great delay before his case is called, and he has to wait on a hot day in May, or a dripping wet day in the rains, hour after hour. Perhaps he employs some one of the native lawyers of the place, but they, though ingenious enough, don't understand a European.

The case is called. Prosecutor and witnesses stand up, confident and well-coached (unfortunately, as nearly all witnesses, true or false, are coached up, it is not easy to distinguish) and he is called on to cross-examine. John is no better lawyer than his countrymen in general, and it is doubtful whether his questions or the ingenious but ignorant questions of his lawyer would do most harm. He may want to call his wife as a witness; and, if they are allowed, the other side will try to break her credit in cross-examination with questions which no modest woman will face. Then there is the judgment after more or less delay. If John is convicted, he is punished; if he is not convicted, he is punished. It has been loss enough to have to leave work and home, to risk illness and dawdle away his time and money in the stuffy Court. It is nothing to the natives on the other side, who are possibly paid for their outing, and even if not, probably enjoy it.

Now, here John is on the defensive, and cannot retaliate in kind. Being a law-abiding, orderly man, he is not likely to retaliate by violence. He needs the utmost protection that the law can give him. He cannot afford a wily detective to expose the plot; without the independent press, and bar and public; with no adviser but perhaps Jane; with no appeal (how could the Court of appeal upset a plausible decision on plausible evidence?) or resort, John is in a bad case.

At every stage in the case he takes comfort from the fact that the magistrate who will try him if accused, will be a European whom he trusts, because he feels a European will understand him. Before any case is instituted, he knows that his enemies will not be so bold in alleging crimes against him of which he is innocent, when they know that the case will pass through the hands of one with some knowledge of the European character. You can persuade a man who knows nothing about them, that turnips grow on trees, but ten thousand witnesses will not make one who knows, believe it. Then the European magistrate will see that there is no undue delay in taking up and disposing of the case; will not fancy insult where none is meant, and will perhaps be more patient with petulance caused by grief of mind. He will be able to understand in all its points the story of the accused, and take the allusions to customs and facts which a native would not understand. He will be able to clear up doubtful points by a few questions put to the witness, which John for want of skill, and the native pleader for want of knowledge, would not think of putting. If Jane comes into the box as a witness, he will be able to understand her feelings and stop all attempt to give her unnecessary pain in a way that a native who has quite a different idea of womanhood, would perhaps, from thoughtlessness, not think of doing. He could strip a false or exaggerated charge of much falsehood or exaggeration as a native, from ignorance of European habits and customs, could not; and would have much greater certainty in attributing its proper weight and significance to each word or action. If he convicted, he would be better able to tell what would be the proper punishment to give.

John and Jane are able with this assurance to walk about as freely and fearlessly in India as at home, though they have no public round them, no press, no European neighbours, and cannot get an English lawyer to defend them if they are attacked. They feel that without the safeguard of a European tribunal, even should they never come before it, they must go about like a crab without its shell, shrinking at every touch, yielding to every one, sneaking into holes. What the public, the press, the bar, and the court are to a law-abiding, law-loving citizen at home, all these the European tribunal is to honest, homely John and Jane in the lonely places of that far-off Eastern land. With all respect to the native protégés of Government, they do not feel that these can possibly be a proper substitute. So, if Lord Ripon insists on saying his native protégés (so very few there are of them) will do as well, John and Jane will have to go about shrinking and trembling for the rest of their time in India, because they do not agree with him, and he, having a giant's power, insists on using it as a giant.

A LETTER to the Right Honourable JOHN BRIGHT, M.P., on the ILBERT BILL, by C. FORJETT, late Commissioner of Police, Bombay.

To the Right Honourable JOHN BRIGHT, &c., &c., &c.
147, Ledbury-road, Bayswater, W.
August 15, 1883.

DEAR SIR,—I may begin by informing you that I was born and bred in India; was there for more than fifty years; completed a service of thirty-five years; so lived amongst and was so associated with the people, that for more than seventeen years the English language was practically of no service to me.

To evince to you that I was no mere lay figure in the service, and that the welfare of the people was what I most earnestly aspired to forward, I beg to quote the following, left on record some thirty years ago, by the Chief Magistrate of the Southern Mahratta country, a province equal in extent to Scotland, of which I was in police charge. "Without fear of contradiction," wrote this officer, "that a more active and industrious officer does not exist than Mr. Forjett, who, on all occasions, has been found ready to sacrifice self for the public good." I beg also to append one of the resolutions of the Bombay Government of Lord Elphinstone's time, that "The improvements in the Bombay Police effected by me, was such as to have entitled me to the gratitude not only of The Right Honourable the Governor in Council, but of every member of the community." In appreciation of my services, especially during the period of the Indian Mutiny, the European and Native communities of Bombay, with the sanction of Government, presented me with flattering addresses and testimonials of the value of £3,850. What was most gratifying to me, the native cotton merchants, after I had retired from the service and quitted India, sent me a handsome address and a purse of £1,500 "in token of strong gratitude for one whose almost despotic powers and zealous energy had so quelled the explosive forces of native society that they seem to have become permanently subdued." The Back Bay Reclamation Company too, after I had quitted the shores of India, allotted to me five shares in their Company which they afterwards sold out, and remitted to me £13,580. These manifestations of private appreciation of official merit, will, no doubt, be viewed as of some significance because of their being without a parallel in the annals of British India, and possibly in those of any other country.

At a great annual Hindoo festival at which from ten to twenty thousand people assembled, women, in a state of nudity, walked through the crowd in fulfilment of vows, to worship at the temple of their god, and it was the cause of much crime. Believing that they were not at liberty to interfere because of its being a religious rite, successive magistrates, in correspondence with the Government, came to the conclusion that interference would be dangerous, and the only course open was to influence the leading men amongst them to speak to and induce the people to abandon the practice. But these men, one and all, declared that such efforts would prove of no avail.

Such was the state of matters when I took charge. Aware, from long experience, of the idiosyncrasy of the people, I was by no means surprised that kindly magisterial interference had proved ineffective. Pitching my tent in the midst of the assembled multitude, I issued a notice that the practice would be no longer tolerated. The first four women who appeared in a nude state were brought to a stand, and proceeding to the spot with the necessary garments, and women whom I had in attendance for the purpose, had them clothed and taken into custody. The festival continued during the week, but there was no renewal of the scene, and after it had come to an end, and the people had all departed, some of the very men whom the magistrates had consulted, came to me at night and heartily thanked me for what I had done, and for the manner in which it had been done. During the seven years I was subsequently in charge, there was no attempt to renew the disgraceful practice, and I hope there has been none since.

When information of the outbreak of the Indian Mutiny reached Bombay, I was desired by Lord Elphinstone, after consultation with General Shortt, who had been one of my predecessors in the command of the police, to speak to the leading members of the Mahomedan community which numbered more than 150,000, and interest them in the preservation of order. If I had done so it would have been looked upon as a show of weakness, if not of fear. I therefore respectfully declined to carry out the order, and the reasons urged by me were deemed by Lord Elphinstone to be sound (vide my book on "Our Real Danger in India," pages 106 to 108), and the sequel completely justified my resolve.

During the same eventful period, I was the only man in Bombay from Lord Elphinstone downwards, who, under convictions prompted by long experience, doubted Sepoy fidelity, disobeyed the order of Government, and saved Bombay (Malleon's "History of the Indian Mutiny," Vol. III., page 47 to 53, and my book, page 127 to 144).

And in convictions, equally strong and well grounded, I now beg respectfully to inform you that the Ilbert Bill is a great mistake. In eighty or a hundred years hence, when the present generations with their ingrained domestic and social peculiarities shall have ceased to exist, and education and moral training shall have swept away the profligacies of Indian life, her sons may then be admitted to the exercise of a jurisdiction co-ordinate with the European.

If the operations of the Ilbert Bill could be limited to the "three or four" natives, men of highly intellectual cultivation, and members of the covenanted Civil Service, who were alluded to by you, no abuse might be apprehended, but the Bill passed and the opening effected, it will not be possible to limit its operation to the Civil Service. This is acknowledged by Lal Mohun Ghose himself, the representative man introduced by you to the audience in Willis's Rooms. He boldly asserted that the "Bill was a very small measure, HARDLY WORTH FIGHTING ABOUT; but that it was a step in the right direction." The Bill passed, it would lighten up the ambition of every administrative officer, from the Tesildar, Mamletdar, and Mhalkuree, to the lowest Kotwal; it would place India in a seething state of agitation and, if the privilege be not extended so as to reach them, it would inspire them with hatred and deep malevolence.

As a rule, these men are corrupt and untrustworthy. Any European official or non-official who has freely mixed with the lower grades of India would fully affirm this. I know it to be the fact. My intercourse with them was of the freest kind. I had their fullest confidence, and every attempt at extortion was freely made known to me. They were aware that I would not throw upon them the onus of proof, for which they were in no way fitted, but would undertake it myself. They have no reliance, moreover, on each other—knowing how easily they are to be cajoled or bribed. Many a sixty and seventy miles' ride I have had in disguise, in pack saddles, in the endeavour to trip up malversation,

The element of caution largely abounds in the Indian official, and there are no magic means or intuitive efforts by which bribing and extortion can be brought to light. Every successful effort, too, unfortunately, becomes immediately everywhere known. The only mode of discovering their secret thoughts and baffling their iniquitous plans is to meet cunning with greater cunning. Often rolled in a mattress, or shut up in a corn basket, or otherwise packed near them, to be within hearing of the demand that is made, and to be enabled to bring the guilty official to justice, have I succeeded in obtaining this result. Sir Bartle Frere will remember a remarkable instance in which the complainant was no less a personage than the brother-in-law of the late sovereign of the Deccan. Of Puna, his capital, I was in police charge. The individual complained of was the chief secretary to the judge and political agent of the entire native nobility of the Deccan. He was a man of wealth, education, high official position, and of no ordinary social influence. I was aware, from information privately communicated, that he was corrupt; but he possessed the implicit confidence of the judge and political agent, and I was without any tangible proof of criminality. I was sent for by the complainant, and was informed by him that the high-placed native in question had demanded a bribe of 2,500 rupees. "I was obliged on a previous occasion," he said, "to bribe him; but being now in great pecuniary difficulty, I begged of him to let me off; my case before the judge is a heavy but perfectly just one, and the issue will depend upon his interpretation of its merits, and he insists on being immediately paid. But" he added, "it must not be known that I have complained to you as I shall be looked down upon and execrated by the Brahmanical community" (both were Brahmins). I then arranged with him the plan by which the secretary was to be brought to justice. But afterwards considering the man's position as an official, his high social influence, the confidence he enjoyed of the judge and political agent, and my knowledge of the perfect ease with which native witnesses were suborned, I saw at once that I could not be exercising too much care in the effort to bring him to justice, and only thought it safe to take action after securing Mr. H. E. Goldsmid, a civil servant of high standing, and Captain Nash, both excellent Oriental scholars, and whom I knew were enemies to corruption, to be my witnesses. With their assistance the man was brought to justice. The phases the undertaking passed through would quite fill a chapter, and equal in interest any tale of fiction or romance.

Nothing in India is more common than official extortion and bribery, the subornation of witnesses, and the concoction of false charges. I shall confine myself to another instance. Individuals, apparently of high respectability, aimed at making no less a person than the Prince of Baroda, the late Gaekwar, the object of a conspiracy. They came to Bombay with what they represented to be a document implicating His Highness and one Dhakjee Dadajee, a highly respectable native gentleman and a Justice of the Peace. Members of Government, the Political Secretary, the Chief Magistrate, and the chief translator of the High Court, and others, considered the document authentic. It was said to have been abstracted from the High Priest of the Gaekwar, who was also the confidential keeper of his important papers. That priest was at this time on a pilgrimage to a place some thirty miles from Poona. Under a resolution of Government, I was instructed by the Chief Magistrate of Bombay to see the priest in the disguise of a native, and, entering into conversation on the subject of the document, to elicit from him what information I could. His offering me a bribe to become repossessed of the document was, at the same time, thought probable. To be enabled to carry out my instructions, it was necessary I should make myself acquainted with the contents of the paper. I did so, and saw it contained clear internal evidence of being a forgery. I saw the priest notwithstanding. He denied all knowledge of the document and charged me with being an imposter. I afterwards made it the subject of an explanatory report. My views were subjected to the criticism of the chief translator and other linguists. The forgery became clearly established, and the parties were, I believe, severely punished.

Such an attempt could not have been thought of unless those making it had been prepared with a number of false witnesses.

India is an arena prolific of forgery, subornation, and counterfeit charges. To receive a bribe, to suborn a witness, or be suborned, to tell what is vulgarly termed "a lie," is considered by no means wrong or immoral. He who can benefit himself by bribes is looked upon with the eye of envy and is spoken of as being a "lucky man;" but he who is not clever enough to steer clear of discovery, is denounced as being "a fool." Aspirants after place and preferment, and officials who in India more consulted their own personal comfort than the public weal may repudiate the allegation; but in that case I shall be prepared to bring forward instances within my own experience that would fill a volume of no ordinary dimension.

I again say that the Ilbert Bill is a great mistake, and its operation, attaining to the proportions it must in time, will place the life, liberty, and safety of Europeans all over India in jeopardy.

You denounce the maintenance of caste distinction as a moral wrong and hold it up to obloquy in no mild-toned declamation. But what is it that enables a handful of Europeans to hold in subjection the millions of India? It is that precious abstraction which we call "BRITISH PRESTIGE." Do away with it and we might as well drum ourselves out of the country.

If the Ilbert Bill is not conceded, you say "There would be a growing discontent, and with that growing discontent a growing disloyalty, and with that growing disloyalty, perils which," you ask your audience, "if they would like to face." Let the present state of matters, Sir, remain undisturbed; let the agitation which the impulsive promptings of sentimentalism has lighted up, be allowed to subside, and with it would become allayed the extemporised phantoms of danger.

Sentimentalism on the Bengal side led to the substitution of promotion of the Indian sepoy by seniority instead of merit, and sentimentalism led to his being inordinately eulogised on the score of valour, in the confident assumption that those measures would call forth his devotion and tend largely to promote his loyalty; but the former led to his ignoring his European officers, and the latter inspired him with the belief that, as a warrior, he was equal to and quite as good as the European. Need I say that these were the causes which brought on the Indian Mutiny?

On that occasion both mutineer and rebel were taught a salutary lesson, and there need be no apprehension of a repetition of such danger. The danger to be apprehended is not from within but from without, and, with all deference to your own views, I beg to say that if the present policy of implicit confidence in Russian good faith is continued, it will not be many years before that danger presents itself. And then, tall talk and loyal professions notwithstanding, neither Bangalore Baboo, nor any other of the classes of India, would raise a finger to help us, and a single check on the frontier would disorganise our Sepoy army, render it worthless and dangerous, and demoralise the whole of India. (Vide Indian history.) I remain, Dear Sir, most obediently yours,

C. FORJETT,

Late Commissioner of Police of Bombay.

To the Right Hon. JOHN BRIGHT.

THE ILBERT BILL.

THE following are the speeches of Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett, Mr. Stanhope, Lord George Hamilton, Sir George Campbell, and the Marquis of Hartington on the Ilbert Bill in the Debate on the Indian Budget:—

Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT congratulated the Under Secretary of State for India upon the lucid, able, and interesting speech he had delivered, and regretted that the hon. gentleman had not been able to make it earlier in the year, when a larger attendance of members might have been expected. He (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) desired on this occasion to refer to certain changes which had been made in the Criminal Procedure of India, and he reminded the House that it would not have been necessary for him to refer to the question now, had not the House been counted out the other evening when he had intended to bring the subject under notice. The administrative and judicial hierarchy of India was not generally understood in England. There had up to the present been a considerable distinction between the services of the regulation and the non-regulation provinces. The former were the older and earlier settled States, and embraced the Governorships of Madras and Bombay, and the Lieutenant Governorships of Bengal and the North West Provinces. The latter contained the provinces of the Punjab, Burmah, Coorg, the Central Provinces, and Assam. The chief civil and judicial officer of the non-regulation provinces was styled a Chief Commissioner, except in the Punjab, where there was a Lieutenant Governor and a Chief Court. In the regulation provinces the superior civil and judicial appointments had only been open to the members of the covenanted services—viz., to those who had passed the regular Indian competitive examinations in this country. In the non-regulation provinces, on the contrary, as they had been annexed and their administration arranged more recently, the high executive and judicial posts had been entirely in the patronage of the Governor General of India. The most important office in the hierarchy of Indian administration was undoubtedly the district magistrate, who, in the non-regulation provinces was styled deputy commissioner. Above him were the Commissioners, who superintended several districts, and above the Commissioners the Governors, Lieutenant Governors, and Chief Commissioners. But the magistrate of a district was the principal and central figure in Indian administration. He was the representative of the British Government in his district. Upon him the whole machinery of government depended. Above the magistrate in his judicial capacity were the district and sessions Judges, of whom there was one for each district. These were for judicial affairs, and had the power of sentencing Europeans to twelve months' imprisonment, fines, and whipping, and of sentencing natives to longer terms of penal servitude. Above the sessions Judges were the High Court in the regulation and the Chief Commissioners in the non-regulation provinces, who had unlimited jurisdiction over both natives and Europeans. Hitherto a European could not be tried and sentenced for a criminal offence by a native magistrate, and not even by any European magistrate who was not of the first class and a justice of the peace. There were but two exceptions. In the High Court there were a few native Judges, but these never sat alone, there being always European Judges present. In the presidency towns of Madras, Bombay, and Calcutta native magistrates had been allowed a certain amount of jurisdiction over Europeans. But then there was the immense security of a large British resident population, of an English Bar, and of English Judges. Now, what changes did the Ilbert Bill introduce? Before considering them at once it was essential that the Act of Parliament of 1868 should be borne in mind. This law enabled the Viceroy to make rules for the nomination to public offices of natives of proved merit and ability, not members of the Government service. Although that was passed in 1868, no step was taken under it for ten years. The Duke of Argyll, acting as Secretary of State in 1869, on behalf of the present Prime Minister, stated clearly what it would be well that those who had to deal with India should never forget. The noble duke said:—

"Since Europeans have generally those qualities by which they have won and still hold the Indian Empire, the tests of competitive examination are on the whole good tests, as between different candidates of the English race. But this principle cannot safely be relied upon as regards the natives of India. It is notorious that in their case mere intellectual acuteness is no indication of ruling power. In vigour, in courage, and in administrative ability some of the races of India most backward in education are well known to be superior to other races, which intellectually are much more advanced. In a competitive examination the chances of a Bangalore would probably be superior to the chances of a Parthian or a Sikh. It would, nevertheless, be a dangerous experiment to place a successful student from the colleagues of Calcutta in command over any of the martial tribes of Upper India. It should never be forgotten, and there should never be any hesitation in laying down the principle that it is one of our first duties towards the people of India to guard the safety of our own dominions."

Indeed two years earlier, Lord Lawrence whose name had been unwarrantably used by agitators in this country was extremely cautious in dealing with the question of native officials in India. In his minute of August 19, 1867, while assenting to the principle that certain posts, not the highest by any means, should be open to natives in the non-regulation provinces, he concluded with the following very forcible remarks:—"The Government of India have not overlooked the circumstance that natives entrusted with administrative duties have a difficulty in dealing with independent Europeans. The Governor General (i.e., Lord Lawrence) in Council expects that the local administrators will frame their proposals with due regard to the expediency of providing English officials for all districts in which European travellers or settlers abound." Lord Northbrook and Sir A. Hobhouse, who were now talking so grandly about the rights of the natives, did absolutely nothing during the years they were in office. Lord Lytton, however, who was accused of many things by his political opponents, first moved in the direction of giving more offices to the natives. The native officials appointed under the rules drawn up by Lord Lytton since 1879 were styled members of "the new statutory service." Mr. Ilbert would repeal the words which confined the power of criminal jurisdiction over Europeans to magistrates who were themselves European British subjects, and proposed to give the power of criminal jurisdiction to four classes who had not hitherto enjoyed it. (a) To Indian natives in the Covenanted service. Of these there are at present nine. (b) To the members of the statutory native service just referred to. (c) To assistant commissioners in non-regulation provinces. (d) To cantonment magistrates. Of these the first and last classes were not likely to give rise to serious disturbance. The really important head under which natives would enter high executive and judicial functions would be the second. In time they might, as members of the Indian Civil Service, amount to a sixth of the official service of India. How, and in what way, had this Bill been introduced, at a time when there was no call for it, or any necessity? As was said lately by an eminent statesman, "The men who are now enriching trade by the cultivation of tea, coffee, indigo, and cinchona, by the manufacture of jute, the working of mines, and the construction of railroads, are not the equals, but the superiors of the races benefited by their capital." That capital was entirely British. There can be no doubt about the effect produced by this Bill, be it just or unjust; it had stimulated race antagonism to an extent without peace since the evil day of the Mutiny. The European nation had risen against it with an unanimously strong opposition. The lower class of Hindoos, especially in Bengal, had been stirred up to a counter agitation of dangerous intensity. If the Bill be the insignificant measure some of its supporters represented, was it wise, was it statesmanlike, with so little excuse, to apply the torch to so combustible a material? Lord Ripon and his advisers had stirred up a fever in India which, at best, it would take years of prudence and calm to allay. Out of the 50,000 European civilians in Hindostan, probably not one-fifteenth part had failed to pronounce their resolute opposition to it. The Volunteers who numbered some 10,000 men, had actually threatened to return their arms if the Bill be passed. Even the army was deeply moved. The British soldier, face to face with millions of an alien people, felt instinctively that anything which weakened British prestige in the East inflicted a perilous blow upon British power. Nor is the official class—that large body of highly educated, experienced, faithful, and high-minded men, who conduct the administration of India with the highest credit to themselves and the most real benefit to the native population—less hostile to the measure. Excepting a few high-placed hostile officials, who belong to Lord Ripon's little clique of sentimentalists and academical radicals, the immense mass of official opinion had pronounced against the Bill. Well, then, what was the excuse for the proposed change? It did not consist in any failure of justice, or in any practical grievance felt by the population. It was based on the desire to remove anomalies. It was a straining after an impossible equality of races, and positions which could never be attained so long as the British flag flew over Hindostan and an English Administration governed the country. If the Government were to base their Indian policy on the removal of anomalies they would enter upon a course fatal to our dominion in India. As Sir James Stephen well said:—"The greatest anomaly of all was the presence of Englishmen of India." Were the right hon. gentleman and his Viceroy prepared to drive their countrymen bag and baggage out of the country which they had rescued from war and tyranny, for that would be the only logical and practical outcome of the argument as to anomalies? As the Judges of Bengal stated in their most convincing report, the anomaly involved in the present state of the law was merely one instance of a state of things on which the entire structure of Indian society depended. The Bill did not extinguish anomalies. It only brought them out in clearer relief. Did England allow native officers to lead her troops? Did she allow native soldiers to man her artillery? Would the Government appoint a native vice-Regent of the Queen? Dared they give a native Judge power of life and death over English men and women? In view of the immense importance of India to England, he affirmed that the determination of British statesmen should be to maintain the authority and power of Britain unimpaired. India enjoyed good government, liberty, and justice. Equality with the dominant race she could never enjoy. India was won by the superior qualities of Englishmen in arms, in statecraft, in commerce, in administration, and could only be kept under the British flag by the maintenance of that undoubted superiority. Did any one think that the same qualities that made the English people the civilising race of the world could be given to the Hindoos? Could they be made courageous, honest, and incorruptible? When gentlemen like Mr. Lal Mohun Ghose came here and prated about the rights of man, and the equality of native and European, they conveniently suppressed the tremendous inequalities which their own civilisation was based upon, and which they cherished as their dearest heritage. They said nothing about their insuperable barriers of caste, and they were very quiet about the fact that natives enjoyed privileges in courts of justice which were not granted to Europeans. The wife of the highest English official might be called upon to give evidence in open court, while many native women, and not only they, but Hindoo men of a certain rank, were exempted from any such responsibility. These were anomalies which the Bengali Baboo, who clamoured for the right of criminal jurisdiction over Englishmen, would not like to see removed. If we were to be respected and obeyed in India, our prestige must be maintained. He held that if this mischievous measure should become law a dangerous blow would be struck at the popular idea of British superiority. The native who should see an Englishman tried and sentenced by one of his own race would soon lose the natural respect which at present was felt for the English. Already a great change had come over the bearing of the natives, many of whom assumed an insolent and defiant demeanour. This might seem a small matter to Radicals at home, but it was a very serious thing for Europeans living alone in a distant province among thousands of alien, ignorant, and excitable people. Insults to Europeans had trebled since the introduction of this Bill, and there had been several cases of grave outrages on English women. Who demanded these new rights? The better class of natives did not want them, nor did the manly and more virile races. Of all Eastern products the Bengali Baboo was the most unpromising and unlovely. He had a subtle character and a glib tongue; of solid and generous qualities he was devoid. Such were the men who hoped to make a good thing out of the agitation, and who were inflaming the minds of the populace against the English rule. His argument had hitherto been mainly based on the weakening of British authority throughout India which this change would tend to bring about. But there was a very practical danger to the European settlers and merchants. The characteristic vice of Eastern litigation was perjury. The subornation of witnesses was not altogether unknown in England, but it was a fine art in Hindo-tan. Europeans in remote corners of India, especially in Assam and the tea-growing districts, where they were far from European communities and surrounded by an alien population, would be helpless if tried by a native magistrate. They would be overborne by the stream of lying witnesses, and the magistrate might easily be prejudiced against them. He would not understand the English feeling or mode of life. An English clerk or artisan, for example, or an engine-driver, or a warehouseman would be quite at the mercy of his enemies in a distant province. He could not afford to employ an English lawyer, or if he could there would be none within reach. That the Europeans in the Mofussil, and especially in the outlying districts, felt this danger acutely, the vehemence and unanimity of the protests against the Ilbert Bill proved conclusively. No one could read the determined and almost desperate opposition of the whole European community to this change in the law without feeling that to them it was a matter of life and death. Many, indeed, openly said they could not stay in the country. The history of the world could show no parallel to the rule of Britain over India. These 250,000,000 of people, of many races and hostile creeds, of ancient origin, and chequered history, enjoyed the blessings of a regular and beneficent administration. For a century they had had peace instead of desolating struggles, security instead of wars and invasions, in which the conquerors pillaged, massacred, and oppressed the vanquished. They had order and law, not the occasional tranquillity of a rigid and unbending despotism, but the regular order of a civilised Power, guided by principles of justice and administered in the main by honourable men. Commerce had been marvellously developed by the union of all India under one beneficial Power, and by the promotion of these wonderful means of communication with which science has furnished man. Ten thousand miles of railways already existed in India, and before the end of this century it was probable that the length of railways would have been trebled. What this meant as an active agent in developing the wealth of Hindustan, in preventing the scourge of famine, in promoting the general comfort of the people, the most ignorant could form some estimate. The education of that vast continent was progressing. The humblest student of this most interesting country could not but wonder at the change which a few generations of British power had brought. He would behold a land not long since swept over by hostile and remorseless hordes as with a besom of destruction, down-trodden and oppressed, and despoiled, now in the peaceful enjoyment of order and good administration. He would see hundreds of thousands of acres of fertile soil recovered from desert jungles that owed their growth to the terror of wild beasts or hostile incursions. He would see everywhere law and even progress instead of capricious tyranny and squalid corruption. All this the Englishman of our generation would find; and seeing it, if he were true to his country and to his race, to his great ancestors, whose courage and skill, whose resolution and statesmanship, had won this splendid country for him and had conferred such priceless advantages upon its people, he would not hesitate—he would make it his first duty and his highest pride—to hand down that matchless heritage of beneficent power unweakened; nay, more strong and more secure to those that come after him. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. STANHOPE, without wishing to enter into the collateral question raised by the hon. member for Slford, observed that in 1879-80 a Special Committee inquired into the incidence of these charges between India and England, and his impression was that the Committee were of opinion that, on the whole, the existing arrangement was the best. He had listened, in common with everybody in the House, with great interest to the able statement of the Under Secretary, and was only sorry he had not had an opportunity of making it earlier in the session. (Hear, hear.) He should like to point out the new position in which they stood in regard to Indian matters in consequence of the new Rules of Procedure. Hitherto it had been possible to bring Indian questions forward on going into Committee of Supply; but now they could only bring on motions germane to the votes. Thus there was hardly an opportunity during the Session of raising Indian questions, except on the Indian Budget, or when a private member was successful in the ballot. He trusted, therefore, that next year the financial statement would be taken earlier in the session. Much of the Under Secretary's speech had been taken up in showing that certain items of expenditure were being gradually reduced, while, as to others, he hoped the expenditure would be increased. He did not think it necessary to point out the fallacy of comparing one year's expenditure with another's by simply contrasting the gross expenditure. He had endeavoured to prove the other day, when he brought forward a motion which was accepted by the House, that the expenditure now was three and a half millions larger than in 1880, and he was not aware that any attempt had been made to controvert that proposition. The Under Secretary told them that the expenditure now was a good one, while that under the preceding Administration was a wicked one. But that had nothing whatever to do with the question. The argument would be quite germane if they were discussing whether the Afghan war was just or unjust; but now that they were endeavouring to compare the ordinary expenditure of one year with that of another, it was trifling with the question to drag in extraordinary expenditure of that kind, and so leading people away from examining into whether the ordinary expenditure had been increased or decreased. (Hear, hear.) He assumed, therefore, that the ordinary expenditure had increased by three and a half millions; and when the hon. gentleman said the reductions made in 1879-80 were not to the advantage of the country, he must ask what had caused these reductions. The Government of the day had come to the conclusion that considerable reductions should take place; but the present Prime Minister objected, not because the reductions were not to the advantage of the country, but because they were inadequate, and he urged a further reduction of four millions in addition to that which was then proposed. The hon. gentleman spoke as if it was a new discovery that public works were a good thing for India; but Lord Salisbury, during the time he was at the India Office, had probably done more for the development of public works in India than any previous Secretary of State. (Hear, hear.) He desired heartily that public works should be pushed forward as the finances of India could afford and the material condition of the country would justify, but not to push them on in advance of the material condition of the people. He maintained that they ought to maintain a fixed policy, to say what amount it would be justifiable to spend over a reasonable series of years, and not to allow that amount to be exceeded by the pressure which came from all quarters. (Hear, hear.) On the subject of the reduction of army expenditure, the Government had proposed a scheme which they said would accomplish a reduction of one-and-a-quarter million, but they learnt that the Indian Government had sent home a despatch containing certain proposals; and the hon. gentleman, while informing them that these proposals had been rejected, forgot to tell them what they were. He pressed against the House being kept in the dark on that point. (Hear, hear.) The time had come when papers giving full information ought to be before the House. (Hear, hear.) He regretted that Major Baring had been called upon to vacate the responsible position he occupied in Egypt. It was a misfortune to India that a master of finance should be called away from India just as he had begun to thoroughly understand the finances of that country. Happily, Major Baring was able to leave the finance of India in a sound position. He (Mr. Stanhope) also regretted that Sir Louis Mallet was no longer able, on account of ill health, to continue at the India Office; he could only hope that that gentleman would long be spared to serve his country in other ways. Reference had been made to the relations with Afghanistan. He did not desire to dwell upon that matter, but he hoped the Government were going to produce papers in regard to it. They all knew perfectly well there had been recent negotiations with the Ameer of Afghanistan. The Ameer had expressed a desire to visit India, but for what purpose they were not told. Now, apparently, the journey had been abandoned. The hon. gentleman the member for Eye, in an admirable speech, had introduced the Ilbert Bill. Although the matter had been very little mentioned in the House, it was one of the deepest importance to all those who took an interest in the affairs of India. There were some hon. members who were in the habit of alleging that the fears of the Anglo-Indians on this subject were exaggerated. It ought to be remembered that the people who were in the best position to judge were those who had had experience of India by living among the population, and who knew the difficulties with which the Anglo-Indians had to contend. There were many who thought that the Anglo-Indians had established most conclusively that the privileges it was now proposed to take away from the Europeans were the important safeguards against the real danger. Who was it who held that opinion? The Judges of the High Court of Calcutta held that opinion. They were well qualified to form an impartial opinion on the subject. After quoting the speech of Sir Stewart Bayley in the debate of March 9, in which he pointed out the dangers to which the Europeans in India would be subject, they said:—

"The Judges concur in the views here expressed; and they consider that the dangers thus described in the case of planters and manufacturers would be even greater in the case of persons in a humbler position in life, railway employees, artificers, and the like. These men are continually brought into contact with natives in ways which may easily give rise to misunderstandings and ill-will. Should an accusation be brought against them, they labour under great disadvantages; they are often isolated from other Europeans; they generally have but an imperfect acquaintance with the vernacular languages; they are unable to retain the costly services of European advocates; and they might in some circumstances find it impossible to secure the assistance even of native practitioners. It is easy to see how the grossest injustice might easily be inflicted in such cases by an officer who from any cause fails fully to realise the position of the accused. It is at any rate certain that Europeans of this class would feel an entire want of confidence in any but a European tribunal. On the whole, after making every allowance for temporary excitement and agitation, it is, the Judges think, impossible to doubt that European residents in the Mofussil do rely considerably on themselves to be, and in fact are, in a position which justifies them in regarding the privilege of being tried by a European, on whose independence and impartiality they can fully rely, as one of very real importance to them."

That opinion so held by the Judges was the opinion which up to this time had been held by all authorities on the subject of the Government of India. He would venture to quote again a remark which was made on the subject by Lord Lawrence. Writing in 1867, Lord Lawrence said, in regard to the re-admission of natives to the Civil Service:—

"In arriving at this decision the Government of India has not overlooked the circumstance that natives entrusted with administrative duties have a difficulty in dealing with independent Europeans. The Governor General in Council expects that the local administration will frame their proposals with due regard to the expediency of providing English officials for all districts in which European settlers or travellers abound."

That was the opinion of Lord Lawrence, but it did not appear to be the opinion of the right hon. gentleman the member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), who had spoken of the opposition to this Bill in most contemptuous terms. The right hon. gentleman had said that all the opposition came from the lawyers, and he added that the reason why the Judges objected was that a native was appointed Chief Judge. A more impudent insinuation he never heard of, and if it did not come from such a quarter he should not have thought it necessary to notice it. The right hon. gentleman would be very much surprised to hear that all those Judges and all those Civil servants were just as much devoted to India as he was, and that they were just as anxious that the relations between Europeans and natives should be improved—and what was more, they had laboured during a long and trying career in India to effect that object. (Hear, hear.) He should not be surprised that many of those gentlemen should be deeply hurt by that observation of the right hon. gentleman. (Hear, hear.) The fact was, the opposition to the Bill did not come from the lawyers. It was quite true that the legal element was as much opposed to the Bill as Civil servants, nine-tenths of whom, both in India and England, were opposed to it. (No, no.) He said that deliberately, and what was more, there were many natives opposed to it. It was a case of experience against sentiment. (Hear.) Was experience to go for nothing? Those most opposed to the Bill had spent their lives in India, they had experience of what native Judges could and could not do, and what they said ought to be weighed by the Government before anything was done. Not one single Government in India was in favour of the Bill, as it had been introduced, and the two principal Governments concerned—those of Bengal and Assam—were opposed to it in every form and desired to have it withdrawn. Now what were the grounds for the Bill? None whatever had been alleged. No one had seriously ventured to put forward the idea that there was any real inconvenience which required a remedy. On that subject the Judges were entitled to express a very strong opinion, and they told us not only that there was no inconvenience now, but that there was in the immediate future no prospect of any, and they went on to say that the course of legislation since 1793 had been invariably against the policy of the measure. They also printed out that it was contrary to the settlement of 1872. The deliberate compromise then arrived at was that there should remain on the statute-book this special privilege of Europeans in India. He had not been able to discover in all the papers he had read any reason for the proposal, except the one broad ground that it was desirable to abolish all race distinctions in India. The answer to that was that they could not do it. (Hear, hear.) Race distinctions necessarily arose in consequence of our position as a governing body, and if they were to be got rid of natives would have to give up far more of them than Europeans. (Hear, hear.) He would like to read a short passage from a speech of Sir J. Stephen, who was a great authority. Sir J. Stephen said:—

"In countries situated as most European countries are, it is no doubt desirable that there should be no personal laws; but in India it is otherwise. Personal as opposed to territorial laws prevail here on all sorts of subjects, and their maintenance is claimed with the utmost pertinacity by those who are subject to them. The Mohammedan has his personal law, the Hindoo has his personal law. Native women, who, according to the custom of the country, ought not to appear in court, are excused from appearing in court. Natives of rank and influence enjoy in many cases privileges which stand on precisely the same principle; and are English people to be told that, while it is their duty to respect all these laws scrupulously, they are to claim nothing for themselves? That while English courts are to respect, and even enforce, a variety of laws which are thoroughly repugnant to all the strongest convictions of Englishmen, Englishmen who settle in this country are to surrender privileges to which rightly or otherwise they attach the highest possible importance? I can see no ground or reason for such a contention. I think there is no country in the world, and no race of men in the world, from whom a claim for absolute identity of law for persons of all races and all habits comes with so bad a grace as from the natives of this country, filled as it is with every distinction which race, caste, and religion can create, and passionately tenacious as are its inhabitants of such distinctions."

(Hear, hear.) Some contended that the opposition to the Bill was contrary to the policy of the Act of 1833, which laid it down that no native by reason of race, religion, and so on should be disqualified. But could any one say it was possible to carry out that principle in every case? (Hear, hear.) Was the hon. gentleman who cheered prepared to appoint a native Governor General of India? Did he think that within any reasonable distance of time natives could be so appointed? Lord Ripon was anxious to shift the responsibility from himself, for he said, "The great change which has taken place in regard to this question from an administrative point of view has been that made by Lord Lytton's Government in 1879;" and he went on to argue that "Lord Lytton's system," "Lord Lytton's rules," caused an irresistible necessity for this measure. Lord Lytton certainly did more for the admission of the natives into the public service than most Governors General, and a great deal more than Lord Ripon by this Bill could possibly effect. Lord Lytton, in accordance with an Act passed in 1870, when the present Prime Minister was at the head of the Government, framed rules for the larger admission of natives into the public service. There was no suggestion from the opponents of the Bill that the natives should be kept out of the offices then thrown open to them. What they said was that when appointed they ought not to be given a new position for which there was no necessity and no justification. (Hear, hear.) His own opinion was that the chief importance of the Bill was derived from the fact that it followed so close upon the heels of the Local Government scheme. That scheme, whether good or bad, was an honest attempt to associate Europeans and natives in the government of the country, and the experiment was about to be tried by Lord Ripon in all parts of the country and under all possible conditions. The essential condition of its success was that Europeans and natives should meet at those boards in the most amicable manner, for if race animosities were excited there was no chance of the success of the scheme. And yet it was at such a time that this Bill was introduced, and that the question of race distinctions of the worst character was raised. The natives believed that we were taking a step which was gradually to lead to the abolition of English and European rule. The native Press throughout India were endeavouring to teach the people that a new era was about to dawn, and that this Bill was the introduction of a new system, for which they could not be too soon prepared. The speech of the Prime Minister himself, who had spoken of the Bill as the first step of a larger policy to be introduced without limitations of time, was calculated to increase the danger. (Hear, hear.) Holding the opinion of the Duke of Argyll and always remembering that our rule rested on the recognition of the fact that we were the stronger, the policy recently adopted was, in his opinion, most unfortunate. If, yielding to a sentiment, the Government of India could achieve no practical object by their present policy, then he protested against the course now being pursued as full of danger. But he did not yet despair. The reason why he had not brought forward before a specific motion on the subject was simply this. Now that Lord Ripon had received the opinions of all the Local Governments of India we could not doubt they would have weight with him. There was no one who would deny that those opinions ought to be conclusive. Could they conceive that a measure ought to be passed which not one Local Government said ought to pass, and that it ought to be pressed upon an unwilling European population? He fully admitted the difficulty in which Lord Ripon was placed, but he hoped that even at this hour prudent counsels might so far prevail, and that Lord Ripon would not be carried away by the encouragement he had received from Radical clubs in England, but would look only to what were the real interests of India.

Lord G. HAMILTON said that the members on that side of the House were of opinion that the policy of the Government with regard to public works in India ought to be continuous. It was a great misfortune that this financial statement had been made the second order of the day at a morning sitting on the last Wednesday of the session. (Hear, hear.) Private members had been induced to consent to a curtailment of their privileges in order that more time might be given to the discussion of important public business, and this was the practical result. In one part of the speech of the Under Secretary for India he entirely concurred—viz., that in which the hon. gentleman regretted the loss India would sustain of the services of Sir L. Mallet and Sir E. Baring. He could not, however, agree with that portion of the speech which related to the question of exchange. No doubt the value of gold and silver, like that of other commodities, depended on the law of supply and demand, but it should be borne in mind that the value of gold was the standard by which the price of silver was calculated. Now, he heard that there was a reasonable prospect of a great discovery of gold in South Africa, and if that occurred, the increased supply of gold would indirectly appreciate silver, and we should once more see it back at something like the figure at which it stood three or four years ago. The hon. member for Eye had introduced the burning question of the Ilbert Bill, and had brought out the obvious objections to that proposal. He would add a few words to his hon. friend's remonstrances. The right hon. gentleman the member for Birmingham outside the House and the right hon. gentleman the Prime Minister inside the House had contrived to entirely misunderstand what would be the practical effect of this Bill, and also the nature of the objections to it. The measure was introduced on a false plea. It was said to be intended to remedy an administrative difficulty, but it was clear that that difficulty did not now exist. If the Bill passed into law it would certainly raise an administrative difficulty of a most serious character. The right hon. member for Birmingham assumed that all the native civil servants who under the provisions of the Bill would have criminal jurisdiction over Europeans were civilians who had undergone a certain course of training in this country. But that was not the case, and in future years the greater bulk of those who would have to administer the criminal law would be natives who had never left India at all. What was the objection which lay at the root of the agitation of Europeans against the Bill? It was that they were especially liable to have false charges made against them. He had seen a remarkable letter from a respected planter in Assam, in which he said, "The dishonesty of the smaller native officials in Assam is appalling. It is well known to our officers. False witnesses can be had in any number at every court. They hang around, sitting under the trees, and can be got to swear and learn their cases beautifully at four annas." Under these circumstances was it too much to ask that Europeans should have continued to them the right which they had enjoyed from time immemorial of being tried by men who could speak their language, understand their customs, and appreciate their motives? The idea of establishing local self-governing institutions in India was based on the assumption not only that all natives were equal, but that Europeans and all natives were equal. In his opinion our Government of India was strong as long as it confined itself to the discharge of paternal and autocratic power, protecting the large masses of the people from the predatory instincts of a small warlike minority; but it would become weak the moment they instituted local self-government, because the Western idea of self-government was based on the fact that the people of a community were equal and more or less homogeneous in race, which the people of India certainly were not. A native member of Lord Ripon's Council had said that his head, under the dictates of prudence, was in favour of the Bill, but his heart was against it. Such sentiments he (Lord G.

Hamilton) believed were held by most of the intelligent natives. He hoped the Government would either withdraw the Bill or substantially modify it. The Viceroy had a majority in his Council, and the Government had a majority in the House of Commons, but if they made use of their majority for the purpose of passing into law a Bill which would do more to create race prejudices than any measure which for many years past had been mentioned in connection with India, upon their head, and upon their head alone, the responsibility would rest.

Sir G. CAMPBELL moved the adjournment of the debate, which was agreed to.

The debate, adjourned on Wednesday on the motion to go into Committee on the East Indian Revenue Accounts, was resumed on Thursday by

Sir G. CAMPBELL, who said he had hoped the Ilbert Bill would not be made a party question. The emphatic statement of the Prime Minister gave assurance that the Government would not allow the matter to be dealt with in a way that would produce trouble in the future. If the amendment of the law which he supported in India in 1872 had been carried, the present agitation would have been entirely averted. He warmly approved the conduct of Lord Ripon in this matter; and he denied that there was any authority for the statement that nine-tenths of the Civil servants of India were against the Bill. He entirely denied that the alarm said to be existing in India was at all of a spontaneous character; it was an artificial alarm created by lawyers and others no better than lawyers. ("Oh!" and laughter.) They were told of telegrams that had been received, describing outrages that had been committed on European women. It was now six weeks or two months since those telegrams arrived, and he had searched the Indian papers for some substantiation of them and had utterly failed to find any. He asserted that the panic among the Europeans in India was ridiculously exaggerated, though no doubt a certain amount of panic did exist. They were told that in India people were liable to false charges, but if they had competent native judges and magistrates, they were the very men to sift out the truth or falsehood of charges made by the natives. Before 1833 Europeans were entirely without any rights or freedom, and in that year was passed the law that no man should be excluded from any office whatever by reason of his race or colour; and yet they were told that a long course of legislation had exempted Europeans from being subject to the jurisdiction of natives. The Calcutta High Court was a strong Court, and he desired to treat their opinion with great respect, but for some time past that Court had been in an extremely bad humour with the Government of India and with Her Majesty's Government, it being proposed to reduce their salaries. The head of the Court, too, was an old Tory lawyer, who had, in an unconstitutional manner, sought to rouse the Zemindars against a measure proposed by the Government, declaring that he prayed that Bengal might never be subjected to the horrible system of confiscation which had been introduced into Ireland. The Calcutta High Court had sent in a protest against the Ilbert Bill, which he admitted to be a very able document. They did not so much positively condemn that Bill, but they attempted with great skill to show that it was not necessary, and that it would have been possible for a time to do without it. Now, without arguing the question whether it might not have been better to set at defiance the Act of Parliament, and have postponed the Ilbert Bill for a few years, until it could be brought forward at a quiet time, he would venture to impress this on the House and the Government—viz., that, however it might have been possible before things had come to the present pass to have put off the measure, yet, now, after the extremely unscrupulous agitation which had taken place against it, it would be the greatest possible political mistake for the Government to give in. By doing so they would be teaching the natives of India the advantages of a system of agitation. The educated natives who had learned our literature, our manners, and our ways, were now ready enough to receive lessons of that kind; and, indeed, they had already a native agitation which had been got up in opposition to the Anglo-European agitation on that subject. The 250 millions of India could not be governed as we governed the five millions of Ireland, and it was very much upon that ground that he hoped the Government would not yield. If the Government were firm and did not yield in any degree, the agitation would not last more than two or three months, and the whole matter would be settled in a very short time. With regard to the natives who were members of the Statutory Civil Service, it appeared to him that the rules laid down during Lord Lytton's Vice-royalty constituted an evasion and perversion of the provisions of the Act of Parliament passed in the early part of Her Majesty's reign. That statute provided that certain appointments previously reserved for members of the Covenanted Civil Service sent out from England should be open under certain conditions and rules to natives of India of proved merit and ability. By Lord Lytton's Government, however, that intention had been perverted. They did not afford facilities to experienced native Civil servants for promotion to higher posts, but they selected by pure patronage a set of young natives who had no proved ability, and who only held certificates from their friends and relatives that they were promising young men and were well connected. He would like to point to a practicable matter which had filled him with regret. Mr. Banerjee, a native gentleman of talent and energy had shown a lack of moral sense which was much to be regretted. Many members had spoken from the other side and from an opposite point of view with respect to this question, therefore he felt it his duty to say a few words on the subject.

The Marquis of HARTINGTON: Although the hour and condition of the House are not propitious, I think it is desirable I should make one or two observations on the subject of the Criminal Procedure Bill, especially as I was the Minister who was responsible for the approval by the Home Government to the introduction of that measure. In my opinion, whatever may be the merits and demerits of the measure, Lord Ripon has been personally most unfairly and unjustly assailed for the part he has taken in regard to this measure. Lord Ripon is the last man who would shrink from any responsibility which properly belonged to him, and not only so, but he is proud of the part he has taken in many measures which have been initiated by the Government of India, and which have brought about him considerable unpopularity among the Europeans in India. When we heard this measure represented as if it had been the outcome of Lord Ripon's sentimental policy, and the result of his desire to attain popularity among the natives, as the result of his insane desire for uniformity and to remove all anomalies, I think it is just to Lord Ripon that the facts surrounding the introduction of this measure should be brought before Parliament. The introduction of the Bill at the present time was owing to the instrumentality of the Government of Bengal, and of the then Lieutenant Governor, Sir Ashley Eden. I am very much surprised to hear the hon. member for Mid-Lincolnshire (Mr. Stanhope) state that Sir Ashley Eden was not responsible for the manner, time, or, indeed, the form in which it had been presented. Now, sir, it happened that the despatch of the Governor of India quoted the opinion of the Government of Bengal upon a particular case it had before it, in which Sir Ashley Eden distinctly stated the opinion that the time had now elapsed when the distinction between natives and the British officials in these respects ought to be removed, and the attention of the Government of India should be called to the subject. It may be open to him to say he did not recommend the introduction of the Bill, but it so happens that Sir Ashley Eden, coming fresh from India, has a second responsibility in this matter, inasmuch as he was a member of the Council at home at the time the despatch asking for leave to introduce the Bill was received, and he was a party to the approval which the Home Government gave to the introduction of the measure. It, therefore, happens that Sir Ashley Eden is responsible in a double sense, and I am at a loss to know what authority the hon. gentleman the member for Mid-Lincolnshire has for the statement he has made. I must ask the House to consider for a moment the former proceedings with regard to this question. In 1870 a very powerful Commission which sat in this country for the purpose of revising the Indian Criminal Law, recommended that further steps should be taken for assimilating the law as regards natives and European subjects of the Queen, and they expressed their regret that further progress had not been made in this direction. Founded upon the report of that Commission a Bill was introduced in India. [At this point Mr. Callan moved that the House be counted. A quorum, however, was found to be present.] A Bill was introduced in India containing provisions which, if not identical were strictly analogous to those of the measure they were now considering, but the provision relating to the trial of Europeans by native officials was struck out. The hon. member for Mid-Lincolnshire (Mr. Stanhope) yesterday alluded to that as a compromise, and added that it was accepted at the time as a permanent settlement of the question. Now, although he was of opinion that it was a compromise, he could not agree that it was then accepted or had ever since been acknowledged as a permanent settlement. On the contrary, four of the most distinguished members of the Legislative Council thought it necessary to move an amendment to the Bill in the Legislative Council proposing a provision exactly similar to that which they were now discussing. These four members not only recorded their votes, but in speeches gave their opinions why the compromise which had been arrived at would not be a permanent settlement, and other members of the Council announced their opinion that it could only be defended as a compromise, and not on broad and general grounds. This was the state of things when the matter was brought by the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal before the Government of India, and before Lord Ripon. Did Lord Ripon force the measure on a reluctant and unwilling House? His first act was to consult all the Local Governments of India, and in the course of a despatch which was almost colourless, and in which he expressed no preferences, he stated that with one exception there was among the Local Governments a universal consensus of opinion that the inequalities and disabilities on native magistrates ought to be removed—(hear, hear)—although there was some difference of opinion as to the precise extent to which that measure should go. When the proposal for the introduction of this Bill came to England it was not necessary for him to overrule the reluctant Legislative Council for the purpose of supporting the Government of India. Members were probably aware of the character of the Council of the Secretary of State in this country. It was not a Council of a Radical or revolutionary character. If it had a fault it erred perhaps too much on the side of timidity, and it was not at all likely to consent to anything of a dangerous character. Yet the introduction of this Bill was assented to by the Council of the Secretary of State without revision and without protest. It might be supposed that it was not fully considered. On the contrary, every one who was aware of the procedure of that Council knew that no measure of this kind could pass the Council without being thoroughly considered and thought out. In the first place, it had to be submitted to the scrutiny of a committee composed of those members of the Council who were supposed to be most specially conversant with the subject, and then a copy of the despatch was placed in the hands of every man before it was discussed at the Council, and no question of this kind could possibly be decided without being fully brought before every member of the Council. Every one who had experience of that body must be aware that the idea of the Council sanctioning anything of a dangerous character was absolutely ridiculous. (Hear, hear.) As to the existing measure it was recommended upon general principles. It was so recommended by Sir Ashley Eden. Natives have been already introduced into the Civil Service of India, and it is hoped they will be introduced in still greater numbers. It has always been admitted that they are specially fitted for judicial functions, much more so than for executive or administrative functions. If you are going to employ them at all it is necessary that they should be employed in responsible positions, and the effect of maintaining the present disability is that natives when they arrive at a certain grade must either be placed in the districts where Europeans are not to be found—that is, in the poorest and worst districts, or else if they are appointed to districts where there is a European population, in the case of a European being accused, the witnesses and all concerned must be sent out of the district to a distance, perhaps, of hundreds of miles. (Hear, hear.) If it were now proposed for the first time that native judges should have jurisdiction over Europeans I could understand that the European population might enter a very strong protest against it. But the fact is that long ago native judges have been appointed in the principal cities, and the power of native judges to try prisoners of all descriptions is precisely identical with that of European judges. (Hear, hear.) They have exercised those powers, not only without complaint, but by the universal testimony of those who have experience of the matter, to the complete satisfaction of all concerned. (Hear, hear.) It is said that the case is different from that of the country districts, because in the cities those powers are exercised in the presence of a vigilant European Bar and a vigilant public opinion. But the fact is that wherever Europeans go a public opinion is created. Owing to daily increasing intercourse and to the extension of the telegraph there are probably but few places in India where European counsel cannot, if necessary, be obtained, and where some public opinion does not exist. Reference has been made by the hon. member for Kirkcaldy to the minutes of the judges to the High Court of Calcutta. It is somewhat characteristic of the extreme unfairness with which this controversy has been conducted in India that that minute was sent home, but that the minute appended to it was never sent home. I agreed with my hon. friend who has just spoken that it is on the whole an elaborate plea for delay in the adoption of this measure rather than an argument in opposition to the measure itself. But able as that document is, I cannot admit that it is invested with any judicial authority whatever. (Hear, hear.) The partisan character of that document is most strikingly exemplified in the eighteenth paragraph. Sir Stewart Bailey would be supposed by any one reading that paragraph to be an opponent of the measure where he was responsible for its introduction and was its supporter. I think I am justified in saying that the minute of the Judges was not a judicial performance, but rather the offspring of partisanship. No doubt the first requisite in judicial proceedings is that a prisoner should have a fair trial, but it is no less important that there should be a general belief that an offence will be punished by whomsoever committed, and that belief will not be extended if the natives see that Englishmen can only be tried by a magistrate belonging to their own nationality. Is not that practice likely to raise in the minds of the natives a suspicion that we think it necessary in the interests of our countrymen to require that they shall have something more than a fair and impartial trial, and that they are tried by men who may be presumed to have some bias in their favour? What are the real causes of the opposition to the measure? It might by some be thought sufficient to say that the Anglo-Indian, whatever may be his merits, and no doubt they are great, is not a person who is distinguished by an exceptionally calm judgment. (Hear, hear.) Agitation having the same character has been seen before when there was as little foundation for it. Probably many hon. members have read the description written by the present Chief Secretary for Ireland of the agitation which arose in India on the passing by Lord Macaulay of what was called the Black Act. The pages to which I refer read as if they had been written about this very agitation. The same alarm was manifested then, and the same prophecies were made, and I doubt not that the result in the present instance will be the same, and that the prophecies which are made will not be fulfilled. I believe that the cause of the prevalent excitement is to be found, not in this measure, but in the general course of policy that has been pursued, both by this Government and the late Government. It has been the policy of the Government for some years past to impress upon the Government of India the desirability of obtaining the assistance of the native population in the government of that country. Over and over again that policy has been inculcated from home. In 1879 a resolution was passed which limited appointments of the value of 200 rupees a month to officers of the army and to natives. That restriction has been rigidly enforced, and has met with all kinds of opposition from the official classes. The same spirit was shown when it was determined that admission to the Engineering College at Roorkee should be confined to natives. I do not say that the agitation has been got up entirely by the lawyers, but I could quote passages in letters in the Indian papers in which it is admitted that the agitation was directed against the policy of the Home Government in providing appointments for native civilians, while there are many Europeans without appointments. The policy of Her Majesty's Government is, in my opinion, founded upon considerations of the most practical character, and whatever difference of opinion there may be, there can, in my opinion, be very little doubt that India is insufficiently governed at the present time. I believe there are many districts of India in which the number of officials is altogether insufficient, and that is owing to the fact that the Indian revenue would not bear the strain if sufficient Europeans were appointed. There is a further reason, in my opinion, why this policy should be adopted, and that is that it is not wise to educate the people of India, to introduce among them your civilisation, and your progress, and your literature, and at the same time to tell them they shall never have any part or share in the government of their country. (Cheers.) The hon. member for Lincolnshire said that it was the policy of the Romans to carry the privilege of Roman citizenship wherever they went. That is, in my opinion, precisely what we are trying to do by this policy; we are attempting to extend to a few of the best natives of India the full privileges of British citizenship; we are attempting to bring a few of them within the rights and powers and privileges of governing themselves as they might be able to govern themselves under a native administration—(hear, hear);—and if it is wise to attempt to do this, surely it is wise to trust to them thoroughly and to invest them with all the powers necessary to place them on an equality with those with whom they are equal. No doubt the discussion which has taken place may lead to some reconsideration of the details of the Bill—the full reports have not yet been received—(hear, hear)—but it would be an error, a fatal error, to withdraw it. (Hear, hear.) Much of the agitation has proceeded from the non-official class in India, and I must point out that they are not responsible for the government of the country, and if we are to be influenced in any considerable degree by their representations we must find some means of revising the form of government so as to invest them with responsibility. I wish to say, in conclusion, that Lord Ripon has the hearty and complete support of his colleagues at home. (Cheers.)

The amendment was then withdrawn, and the Budget resolution was agreed to.

NATIVE CIVIL SERVANTS IN INDIA.

In reply to Sir G. Campbell, Mr. CROSS said: Natives of India appointed to the Civil Service under the statutory rules (framed in exercise of the powers given by 33 Vic., c. 3, sec. 6) are nominated by the local governments subject to the approval of the Governor General in Council. The appointments being entirely in the hands of local governments, the Secretary of State is not informed as to the particular qualifications of the gentlemen who are from time to time appointed. Every appointment is in the first instance provisional, the nominee being on probation for at least two years. No one is finally admitted into the service until the local government has reported to the Government of India that he has acquitted himself satisfactorily during his term of probation, and has passed all the prescribed examinations. The rules also provide that no one can be nominated for employment if more than twenty-five years of age, except on grounds of merit and ability proved in the service of Government, or in the practice of a profession, clearly indicating that men of proved merit and ability can be appointed.

In answer to a further question by Mr. Macfarlane,

Mr. CROSS said: It certainly is not intended to invest anyone with jurisdiction over Europeans who has not a perfect knowledge of the English language.

Mr. MACFARLANE asked whether it was the new measure or the Act of 1833, which laid down the position that a knowledge of the English language should be a necessary qualification.

Mr. CROSS: The new offices about to be conferred will depend upon the will of the Viceroy, who would never think of appointing in any circumstances, anyone who did not understand English.

ALLEN'S INDIAN MAIL.

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 4, 1883.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

OUR advices by the overland mail are, from Bombay, Aug. 14; Madras and Allahabad, Aug. 13; Calcutta, Aug. 12.

MR. C. B. CLARKE, M.A., F.R.S., late Fellow of Queen's College, Cambridge, and for many years past the Senior Inspector of Schools in Bengal, has written a minute on the Bengal Tenancy Bill, which will certainly take rank as one of the ablest State Papers that have appeared on the Bengal Land Question. Well known at Cambridge as one of the most accomplished political economists of the age, Mr. Clarke has lived among the people of Bengal on terms of intimate friendship; and consequently brings to the consideration of this great question a combination of qualifications which invest his opinion with the highest authority. We shall take an early opportunity of reproducing and commenting on his paper. We cannot doubt that it has already received the consideration it deserves, both from His Excellency the Viceroy and from the Secretary of State, and we are sure it will be read with interest by all those who recognise the vast importance to India of the issues involved in the momentous question it elucidates.

WE deal in our leading columns with the capital speech against this ill-considered measure of Lord Ripon's, delivered by Mr. Morrison at the recent meeting at Bhagalpur. The Englishman thus notices the same speech:—

"If the object of the framers of the proposed new Rent Bill for Bengal and Behar were to do justice, and not to enforce their own quasi socialistic theories of tenant-right, there would be some chance of their being moved by Mr. Morrison's scathing exposure of the one-sided character of its provisions. Seeing, however, that the Bill is intended to be one-sided, it is to be feared that such demonstrations of its true character are mere labour wasted. It is impossible to study together the history of the Bill and the controversy to which the question has given rise, without seeing that the Government of the hour has marked out the proprietors as victims, and that argument on their behalf is worse than thrown away. The more they protest, the more exacting their persecutors become; the more impregnable their logical position is shown to be, the more keenly they are made to feel that logic has no place in the sic volo sic jubeo method of legislation, which is the order of the day. The Government, however, should not forget that there is one respect in which, from an ethical point of view, at all events, a despotism is less free than a Constitutional Government. While a Constitutional Government represents both parties to a contract between State and people, a despotism represents only one of the parties. The odium of setting aside such a contract is, therefore, indefinitely greater in the case of the latter than in that of the former. If the former rightly demands strong evidence of necessity before it ventures on such a course, and even then hesitates long before adopting it, the latter should venture on such a course only on still more conclusive evidence of the necessity, and after still greater hesitation. That, if the Government of India should avail itself of its plenary powers of legislation to pass the proposed Rent Bill, it will be deliberately setting aside a solemn contract entered into by its predecessors, and repeatedly ratified by successive administrations, admits of no manner of doubt. It may do so, for it possesses a giant's strength; but it will not do so without destroying absolutely and for ever all faith of the people of India in its engagements, and, for a Government that exists largely by faith, this is a terrible thing to do.

WE reproduce elsewhere an article from the Indian Mirror—the Calcutta Native daily that is the leading supporter of the Ilbert Bill in the Indian Press—on the Bengal Tenancy Bill; in which the postponement of the Bill is urgently called for, mainly on the ground that perseverance with it will deprive Lord Ripon of the support of the Bengal landowners in the Ilbert Bill controversy. The Maharaja Sir Jotendro Mohan Tagore, K.C.S.I., has often been described as in a way the originator of the Ilbert Bill; but it should never be forgotten that the petty measure suggested nearly two years ago by the Maharaja was something altogether different from the Bill as developed by Lord Ripon's "breathless benevolence." As a fact, the amount of support that has been accorded, and is likely to be accorded, to the pernicious Ilbert Bill by the nobles of Bengal, as by the upper classes of India generally, is just what might be expected from the circumstances of the case. No reasonable person would expect the upper classes of Bengal to be able altogether to see through and despise the insidious race-flattery of Lord Ripon's proposals; whilst, on the other hand, their enlightenment naturally renders them averse to any wanton persecution of the poorer class of Englishmen, their position puts them above the temptation to feel any pleasure in such persecution, and their patriotism recognises the magnitude of the calamity to India involved in the fierce race-hatred that must ensue from Lord Ripon's determination to force the measure through. It can hardly be doubted that the Raja Shiva Prasad's famous declaration—that his head was for the measure, his heart against it—very aptly represented the mental attitude of the upper classes of India towards the Ilbert Bill; and we do not for a moment believe that that attitude will be affected by the Bengal Tenancy Bill. Still, in the interests of justice, it will be a very good thing if the contrary opinion should find favour at Simla; for in that case, the iniquitous Tenancy Bill will be postponed, and, we trust, ultimately dropped.

THE Liberal, the organ of the venerable Keshub Chunder Sen, thus comments on the article of the Indian Mirror:—

"The Indian Mirror is concerned at the unfortunate breach caused between the Zemindars of Bengal and the members of the Indian Association by differences on the subject of the Rent Bill. The breach will neutralise the working of the National Fund movement and, says our contemporary, will hamper the passage of the Criminal Bill through the Council. Hence the advice tendered to the Marquis of Ripon that His Excellency should postpone the passing of the Rent Bill till a more favourable occasion. We are not aware how far the Zemindars will feel disposed to accept the advice. Of course they will receive no transcendental satisfaction on being told that their destiny is to be decided on a future occasion. Like doomed kids before Kali their sacrifice is only delayed. Can any one tell us if the postponement of the measure will lessen the virulence of the present agitation against the Bill? If not, it is useless to suggest the postponement of an evil day. If that day must come, let it come at once. The more reasonable course, we think, would be to suggest a compromise. Impartial men are agreed that the Rent Bill is an extreme measure, intended solely to benefit the ryots; and it is this extremely partisan character of the Bill that has drawn down upon it the hostility of the Zemindars. For our part we have already expressed our opinion that the truth about the Zemindars and ryots is to be found between the two extremes of partisanship. If that be true, let there be a compromise at once. When a compromise has been found in respect of the Criminal Bill which deals with the most incompatible classes of Her Majesty's subjects, we do not know why none should be found as between the Zemindars and the ryots, who belong to the same race or community. We humbly suggest this view to the combatants on both sides."

THE Liberal also gives an account of the wise and patriotic action of the Native Christians of Krisnaghur, who have assembled in public meeting, and passed resolutions imploring their fellow-Christians of the Native community—and especially the Rev. K. M. Banerjea, their acknowledged head—to abstain from the political agitation set on foot by Mr. Surendra Nath Banerjea. A full report of this interesting meeting will be found elsewhere.

THE wish being father to the thought, the Radical Press has been confidently asserting that the agitation against the Ilbert Bill among the Englishmen of India must speedily subside if Government only remain firm. Will that opinion still be put forward, after the magnificent demonstration at Calcutta ten days ago, and the great meeting of railway employees at Allahabad, Cawnpore, Lucknow, and elsewhere, that have been held during the past week? With Radical fanaticism all things are possible; and we all know that, when hard facts belie the immutable principles of Radicalism, it is "so much the worse for the facts." But can it be that Lord Ripon and Mr. Gladstone are so utterly blind to the teachings of English history, and so grossly ignorant of the spirit of the English race, as to fancy that Englishmen will tamely submit, and will cease to agitate, if only they are sufficiently ground down under the heel of a small-minded despot?

WE think it is well that the Englishmen of India have evidently determined to give the Viceroy no excuse for pretending, after the bill is passed and the mischief done, that the Government was not sufficiently warned of the consequences.

PERHAPS Mr. Bright, when he reads of the meetings of railway operatives in India, and of the delegation of Mr. Atkins to England to represent in propria persona the feelings of the Association of which he is the Secretary, will repent him of the heartless sneer with which he received the declaration of the London Committee that the Ilbert Bill will chiefly smite the poorer classes of Englishmen in India. But those who are old enough to remember Mr. Bright's opposition to the beneficent factory legislation of earlier days, will not be surprised at his coming forward to support and abet the persecution of English working-men in India.

As we have all along maintained in these columns, the question is really a working-man's question; and if Mr. Atkins can only succeed in enlightening the working-men of this country as to the real state of affairs, and the way in which Lord Ripon proposes to crush their brethren in India, we verily believe that such a tempest of just indignation will be aroused throughout England as will suffice to sweep the cruel persecutors from power.

WE are glad to observe that the second resolution passed at the working-men's meeting at Allahabad adverted to the deadly injury that this measure will inflict, not only on the English, but also on the native working-men of India. This is a point on which special stress was laid by Mr. Lethbridge in his speech at Limehouse last month—that the presence of skilled English artisans in India, to guide and instruct the native workmen, immensely improves the position and increases the wages of the latter—and that, consequently, a measure which drives away English skilled labour from India is certain to harm the Natives in the long run even more than the English.

SURELY this resolution of the Anglo-Indian working-men must once more put to shame Mr. Bright, and the other slanderers of Anglo-Indians, who never weary of misrepresenting the opposition to the Ilbert Bill as born of hatred against the Natives.

It is announced that the eagerly-looked for local reports on the Bill left India by the mail of August 14, and will therefore be in Lord Kimberley's hands next week. The Secretary of State will doubtless promptly hand them on to Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Chamberlain; for his treatment when Colonial Secretary has taught him not to kick against the pricks—as he showed clearly enough, when ordered by the Caucus to hold no terms with the Anglo-Indian deputation. We trust that Mr. Gladstone will remember his Parliamentary promise to Mr. Stanhope, that these reports should be at once published and circulated, even if received during the recess. And above all—no “stellar space,” please!

THE Anglo-Indians of Devon have nobly commenced the struggle against tyranny by meetings at Exmouth, Budleigh Salterton, and Teignmouth, to protest against the Ilbert Bill. We give elsewhere a report of the meeting at Teignmouth, and gladly note that these gatherings are preliminary to a larger meeting, to be held soon at the county town.

THE Indian Spectator of Bombay thus notices the horrible case of the outrage on Mrs. Hume by the Calcutta Meheter, whose trial we report in another column:—

“With at the faintest desire to question the justice of the decision arrived at by Judge and Jury in the case of the Calcutta Meheter, we confess it is difficult to realise how such a wretched man could have committed the offence he has been charged with. It would be easy enough to believe that the man entered the bath-room with the object of stabbing or strangling his victim. But a criminal assault of this most brutal character on a European lady seems to us to be too much for a Bengali sweeper. However, there is no room for doubt after the evidence that has fallen. The Meheter's categorical denial counts for nothing.”

THE Indian Mirror states that “the majority of the jury,” that condemned the Meheter, “were Native gentlemen.”

THE Pioneer says:—

“We have received from England a copy of the Parliamentary paper containing the ‘garbled telegram,’ which, by the way, is described as the telegraphic summary of the debate of March 9th, ‘furnished to Reuter's Agency by the Government of India.’ A foot-note explains that the sentence put into the Viceroy's mouth, to the effect that ‘in a certain number of years the whole Covenanted Service would consist of natives,’ should have read ‘one-sixth of the whole, &c.’ The omission was due to a clerical error; it is said, but on whose part does not appear. No-reference is made to the cost of the telegram.”

A KRISHNAGHUR clay figure-maker, is now working in one of the Calcutta Exhibition sheds, making life-size figures in clay of “types of the people”—Bengalis, Sikhs, and so on. Krishnaghur is noted for its clay figures.

WE are glad to learn that the Secretary of State for India has selected Pandit Syamaji Krishnavarma, the accomplished assistant of Professor Monier Williams at Oxford, to be the delegate for India at the forthcoming Orientalist Congress at Leyden. It will be remembered that the learned Pandit efficiently represented his country at the Berlin Orientalist Congress in 1881. Lord Kimberley is to be congratulated on his choice.

THIS is what the Indu Prakas of Bombay says of Mr. Surendra Nath Banerjee's “National Fund” movement:—

“Some remarks made by Babu Surendra Banerjee in his speech on the necessity of forming “a national fund” for a constitutional agitation in England of India's interests, have aroused in certain quarters a certain amount of adverse and bitter criticism. The Babu spoke rather contemptuously of the Bengal Zemindars, and charged them with being not only apathetic but hostile to the interests of the people. It is only natural that these insinuations should give pain to those against whom they were cast. The Zemindars of Bengal probably have their failings like other men; but it is not proper to abuse them because at present they happen to be the best abused class in the country. They have become eyesores to Government officials in Bengal, who would be only too glad to deprive them of the security afforded to their position by Lord Cornwallis's Settlement. But that is no reason why such advocates of the popular cause as Babu Surendra Nath should run them down or deprive the cause of their sympathy and co-operation by importing into the discussion of a question of national importance, differences of opinion on other subjects between himself and them. Union is not promoted by setting one class against another, when it is to the interest of both that they should sympathise with and join each other in certain national concerns. We, for one, are disposed to think that the services of such representatives of the Zemindari interest as Maharaja Sir Jo endro Mohan Tagor, Babu Kristo Das Pal, and Dr. Rajendralal Mitra are as essential to the good of the country as those of Babu Surendra Nath Banerjee; and it would be thousand pities if the national fund, which Babu Surendra Nath wishes to raise, were made the fund of any particular class of thinkers or politicians.”

WITH respect to the Freight Market, the following is corrected up to Aug. 11:—

“Our supply of steam tonnage still continues abundant for present necessities, and no rise can be quoted in rates for early loading; only one steamer has taken the berth during the past week, securing previously ruling prices, but for next month's shipment an advance has been paid for both wheat and jute. By the Cape there has been a slightly better demand for forward tonnage, but at prices which have not as yet resulted in business. Five ships have found employment since last week—one for London, three for Liverpool, and one for New York, all at previous rates. Our unfixed tonnage amounts to 55,000 tons.”

THE Indigo Market is thus reported on by Messrs. William Moran and Co.:—

“Since our last issue the weather has been less favourable, generally over Behar, too much rain having fallen everywhere; produce has consequently not been so good as it should have been, and without a spell of fine weather, the Khowties are not likely to give a good return. Of the three districts, Champaran is the most advanced, and the first cuttings are nearly all worked off. In our next issue we hope to be able to give the probable result of first Mahai from all three zillahs. There is no improvement to report from Lower Bengal. Moorshedabad and Rajshyhe will probably do about the same as last year, perhaps a little better. We doubt whether either Kishnaghur or Jessore will equal last year's out-turn, while Purneah and Bhagulpore are likely to fall considerably short of it. Midnapore and Burdwan had good prospects until lately, when they were rather damaged by floods. From the Benares Provinces we hear of too much rain in Shahabad, and the want of it in other zillahs. In the Doab the season has been unusually dry throughout, and the want of rain is now being very much felt. Should the drought continue, it is doubtful whether the out-turn will come up to the expectations formed at the opening of the season."

THE following is Messrs. Carritt and Co's Fortnightly Tea Market Report:—

"Auctions held during the fortnight have been unusually heavy. On the 2d inst., 15,121 packages were offered, of which 14,258 sold, and on the 9th inst., 15,282 packages, of which 14,273 changed hands. The catalogues have comprised a large assortment of useful liquoring invoices, those from Assam and Darjeeling being especially worthy of notice; the latter arrivals from Cachar and Sylhet show considerable improvement in quality, and some of those sold on the 9th inst. were desirable in cup as well as make. The tea from the Doorars continue generally rather unsatisfactory. Although there has been a fair enquiry for all descriptions, a decided decline in values all round must be quoted. Teas under 1s. 2d. are fully 1d., and in the case of broken teas  $1\frac{1}{2}$ d. lower. Medium grades have fallen 1d. to  $1\frac{1}{2}$ d., and fine and finest quite 2d. per lb., except in the case of a few extra choice parcels."

THE Bombay Gazette gives the following obituary of the week:—Captain W. Coles, 12th N.I., Pishim camp; Mr. Walter Scott, C.E., late manager and secretary, Bombay Gas Company—died in London; Mr. J. C. Leach, pleader, Allahabad; Mr. J. H. Penn, late judge, Small Cause Court, Jullundur; Mr. H. C. C. Wood, barrister, Agra.

THE WEATHER AND THE CROPS.

THE following is the official summary of the Agricultural Department's reports on the state of the weather and condition of the crops throughout India, for the week ended July 31:—

"The rainfall of the past week has been deficient over the southern districts of the Madras Presidency. In Bombay rain is urgently wanted in parts of the Southern Mahratta country; elsewhere the fall has been light, but sufficient for present wants. The Indus river has again fallen below its normal level in Sind, and a scarcity of water is felt in consequence. Throughout Rajputana and Central India the weather is generally favourable, but more rain is much needed in Marwar, where the tanks continue empty. In Hyderabad also the tanks are not yet quite full, but the kharif crops are doing well. In British Burma the rainfall up to date in the Arakan and Tenasserim divisions is below that of the previous year, but so far appears to have been sufficient. In the Irrawaddy delta it exceeds the average. In parts of Assam and in two divisions of Bengal a deficiency in the rainfall is retarding the rice crop, but prospects are on the whole satisfactory. Except in Jubbulpore and Sambulpore, light rains have been generally prevalent in the Central Provinces during the week under report, and the weather continues cloudy and seasonable. In the North-Western Provinces and Oudh hot westerly winds are reported from Meerut, and rain is urgently wanted in that district and in Saharanpore. In most other districts rain averaging from one to two inches fell during the week. The Punjab has been practically rainless, and rain is urgently required. The standing crops in Madras and Mysore, except in two districts where the rainfall has been deficient, promise well, and are being harvested in some places. Rice is still being transplanted in Bombay. Some damage has resulted from excessive wet in Dharwar, and locusts are becoming more numerous in the Deccan. Kharif sowings have for the most part been completed in Hyderabad, Central India, Rajputana, the North-Western Provinces and Oudh, and the Central Provinces; and the young crops, which are generally in good condition, are being weeded. In the Punjab ploughing and sowing are still going on. Transplanting of rice is being pushed forward in Assam and Bengal whenever the weather is favourable; and harvesting of early rice and jute has commenced. Ploughing is nearly finished in Burma, and transplanting and sowing are in progress. Cattle-disease and cholera are generally more prevalent. Prices continue to fluctuate, and are rising in parts of the North-Western Provinces and Punjab."

TELEGRAPHIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE following is the usual weekly telegram from the Times correspondent, dated Calcutta, September 2:—

"It is now very evident that the agitation against the Criminal Procedure Bill has not died away. For some months past the European community has been quietly awaiting the publication of the provincial reports upon the measure and the announcement of the intentions of the Government. It was clear, however, to all who cared to look below the surface that this quiet did not mean apathy, and that the public disliked the Bill as heartily as when it was first introduced. The long delay in the publication of the local opinions and the growing conviction that the Government is determined to pass the Bill have had the effect which might have been expected; and during the last week meetings of indignant protest have been held in various parts of the country, the majority of them having been convened by railway employees at large stations on the main lines of communication."

"The most important and significant of these meetings was that held at Allahabad on Monday last. Three hundred persons attended it, and the proceedings are described as having been marked by great enthusiasm and earnestness. Speaker after speaker attacked the Bill, dwelt upon its dangers to the English operatives in India, and upon the imperative necessity for sending a delegate to England to plead their cause with their brother working men there, and to ask for their practical sympathy and help. The following resolutions were carried unanimously:—

"First, that this meeting views with pain and regret the want of consideration displayed by the Viceroy and the Home Government for the opinion of official and non-official Anglo-Indians expressed with regard to the Ilbert Bill, and the inclination displayed by the Government to prevent the official views from becoming known to the people of England; therefore, this meeting resolves that a representative be sent to England to make the working classes of Great Britain acquainted with the truth, and to ask their support and assistance to prevent the Bill from becoming law."

"Second, that Mr. Atkins, having been appointed by the working men of India their representative to the working men of Great Britain, in order to obtain their sympathy and support in opposing the Bill, this meeting heartily approves his appointment, and requests Mr. Atkins to point out to the working men of England how great are the disabilities and disadvantages we labour under, and how terrible a danger menaces us in the passage of the Ilbert Bill. Also that the policy which led to its introduction is injurious to the best interests of the European and native working men of India."

"The third resolution adverted to the delay in publishing the official opinions; while in the fourth resolution the meeting pledged itself to maintain the agitation by all legitimate means till the Bill should be withdrawn."

"Similar meetings, at which similar resolutions were passed have been held at Cawnpore, Lahore, and other great railway centres; and at all of them Mr. Atkins was charged to represent the facts to the working classes of England. It is stated that he will start upon this mission by Tuesday's mail."

"The Behar indigo planters held a crowded meeting at Mozuffpore on Thursday last, when they expressed regret at the defiant position taken up by the Government in entirely disregarding the universal public protest of the classes affected by the proposed legislation; and bound themselves to oppose the passage of the Bill. These sentiments were endorsed at a meeting of the non-official community in the district of Malda. It is probable that the Darjeeling and Assam planters will follow the same example."

"The Bombay Gazette publishes a summary of some of the opinions sent in by members of the Madras Government. Mr. Grant Duff, the Governor, is strongly opposed to a withdrawal of the Bill, which, he states, would be the gravest political error yet committed in the domestic politics of India, as it would hand over the government of the country to irresponsible persons, who do not know the legal conditions under which they are at present living. He does not believe that the Bill would send any European capital out of India. However, he would confine the Bill to what was originally contemplated—namely, giving full powers to Covenanted native civilians. He doubts whether it is wise to form plans for the distant future in India, and thinks it would be well to deal with difficulties as they arise."

"General Sir Frederick Roberts holds that the Covenanted native civilians must be put on the same footing as their European colleagues, but he would not go further. In his opinion, the natives are not yet fitted, morally or socially, for the Covenanted Services. No doubt the natives should be gradually educated to take a share in public affairs, but there is a dangerous side to the question. No class will long be content with the management of Local Boards, and they will eventually ask for a voice in the Government, and for this they are not yet fit. Race antagonism is not decreasing, except, perhaps, in the native army. The Government should not be too rapidly progressive; it should feel its way. Mr. Sullivan agrees with every word of the minute of Sir Frederick Roberts. The Advocate General regrets that the Bill was introduced so soon, but regards legislation in this direction as inevitable later on. He would now go on with the Bill, but confine its operation to Covenanted civilians. The Chief Justice of Madras is against a withdrawal of the Bill, but the other Judges of the High Court oppose the measure."

"All opinions received by the Government were sent home by the mail of the 14th of August, and should reach England this week. It is believed that a letter accompanied them conveying the final recommendations of the Indian Government. What those recommendations are has not transpired. There can be little doubt that the Government proposes to go on with the Bill, with some modifications. It is generally supposed that considerable difference of opinion exists, even among the members of the Executive Council. It is stated that the provincial reports will be published in Saturday's Gazette; and although the Government reckons among the supporters of the measure even such lukewarm adherents as Sir Alfred Lyall and Sir Frederick Roberts—every one, in fact, who does not absolutely suggest the withdrawal of it—still there can be little question that the enormous majority of the officials are entirely opposed to the Bill.

The Committee appointed by the Calcutta Port Commissioners to consider the question of extending the accommodation of the port have strongly recommended, inter alia, that the site of the proposed railway bridge should be changed from Hooghly to Cossipore, close to Calcutta. They consider that no scheme of port improvement can be complete without a bridge connecting the docks and railways on the east and west banks of the river; that without such a bridge, any extension of railway communication in the direction of Midnapore or the districts south and west of Howrah, will be entirely cut off from the proposed docks at Kidderpore, on the Calcutta side of the river, except by making a détour of forty-two miles to cross the bridge at Hooghly; and that the Hooghly site is too far above Calcutta to be of any use in working the port. They point out that any extra expense which the change of site might involve would be more than met by its obviating the necessity for doubling the Eastern Bengal Line, between Nyhatta and Calcutta; and they feel confident that with the constantly increasing traffic a bridge close to Calcutta will soon become a necessity. Even if a bridge be built on the site now proposed, it is probable, they urge, that the Port Commissioners will make a strong representation to the Government on the subject. Little work has yet been done on the Hooghly site; and the material imported from England would do equally well for a bridge on the Cossipore site. The river is somewhat broader at the latter point; but the extra expense thereby caused would be insignificant, compared with the greater advantages secured.

"The question, it is added, is one of great moment, not only to the commercial and travelling public, but also to the shareholders of the East Indian Railway Company. If the bridge be constructed at Cossipore, the whole length of their existing line would be fully utilised. If the Hooghly site be finally selected, then over forty miles of the East Indian system would cease to be useful for anything except limited local traffic, a proportionate share of the freight on the up-country traffic would be lost, and a heavy toll would be payable to the Eastern Bengal Company for the privilege of running over some forty miles of its line; and, as the last agreement with the Government gave the East Indian Company one-fifth share of the profits, the loss to the company would be considerable.

Some rain has fallen in all the districts of the North-West; but more is greatly wanted, the effect of the drought being much felt. Even as far down as Benares the crops have suffered; and in most districts they are actually withering. In the Punjab the prospects are especially bad. In the Delhi, Hissar, Umballa, Umritsur, and Lahore divisions anxiety is felt regarding the grain, grass, and fodder. There is a slight fall in prices owing to the cessation of the demand from Bombay for grain for export."

"Mr. Graham, an experienced Alpine climber, with two Swiss guides, has arrived at Darjeeling, and will proceed shortly to Sikkim, with a view of attempting to make the ascent of the Kinchinjunga Mountain, upward of 28,000ft. in height. He proposes, if the weather be favourable, to make a stay of about one month at Jangri, at the foot of the mountain, to explore the ranges in the vicinity. Mr. Graham made a circuit of the mountain last March, but he did not attempt the ascent.

"It was rumoured here last week that the important tribe of the Ghilzais had risen against the Ameer. There was no truth in the report. The Ghilzais are doubtless discontented at the Ameer having raised their tribute, and held them responsible for the raid made recently on a caravan near Jagdalak. But Mag Mahomed Khan, one of their leading chiefs, has just waited on the Ameer at Mama Khel; and Khan Mahomed Khan, another important chief, has started to try and recover the property for which the tribe is held answerable. Many other influential Ghilzais are with the Ameer. There have been disturbances among the Zurmat and Kullowaz, in which Mushk-i-Alim is believed to have been implicated; but General Katab Khan, with a small force, easily quelled them, destroying many forts, among them that of Mushk-i-Alim. The rumour of the Ameer's assassination appears to have been started by some servants of the British Envoy, Afz Khan, who have been dismissed and sent back to Peshawar.

"The alleged Russo-Persian Treaty is still regarded in Simla as mythical. The Pioneer states that, although the nominal outpost of the Askabad force is Baba Durmez, 130 miles north-west of Sarakhs, it appears that Chacha, thirty miles from Sarakhs, and the place where the direct road from Northern Persia to Merv leaves Khorasan, is looked upon as Russian territory, parties of Cossacks being nearly always there, and the people having been forbidden to pay their revenue to the Persian authorities. It also appears that the British officer now at Meshed was warned not to visit Chacha, as the Russians objected to his presence there."

The trade returns of British India for the first quarter of the financial year show an increase in the imports, excluding treasure, of nearly a crore of rupees, and in the exports an increase of over 12½ crores, as compared with the corresponding period (April, May, and June) of last year.

THE ILBERT BILL.

MEETING AT TEIGNMOUTH TO PROTEST AGAINST THE ILBERT BILL.

ON Saturday last an influential meeting was held under the auspices of the Teignmouth District Conservative Association at Brooks's Hotel, to consider the Indian Criminal Procedure Bill, introduced by Mr. Ilbert and the policy of the present Government in reference thereto. Mr. JOHN ELLIOT, jun., of Elmhurst, presided.

Letters expressing regret at their unavoidable absence and sympathy with the object of the meeting were received by Colonel A. W. Ord, from General Lucas, C.B., J.P., General Daniel (Exmouth), Messrs. C. R. Collins, J.P. (Hele), J. T. Flemming, J.P. (Bigaden), A. Mohun-Harris, J.P. (Bishopsteignton), W. Barron, (Bishopsteignton) &c. General Lucas, C.B., in his letter said. "I sincerely trust that every effort may be made to prevent the Ilbert Bill from being carried. I am certain that it is only from people in England not being able to understand the great difference which exists between a people divided by caste prejudice, which had been held in subjection for centuries, and themselves. I have passed the greater part of my life in India, have seen a great deal of native life, and have a great liking for the natives, but I have no hesitation in saying that they are not yet fitted to have the power of trying Englishmen. It is in agitations of this nature that discontent is engendered in the native mind; and if continued and fed they will certainly lead to very serious consequences. It is only those who have spent their lives in the Indian service who thoroughly understand how further powers can be entrusted to the native population with safety, and who can see what damage there is in forcing a measure such as the Ilbert Bill on India. It is a known fact that in any serious cases the natives would prefer trial by an English jury to one of their own countrymen."

A letter was also read from Exmouth and East Budleigh Districts Association asking Colonel Ord to convene that meeting with a view to co-operating with them in holding a general meeting at Exeter to protest against the introduction of the Ilbert Bill. Attention was called to the fact that the Radical party at Exmouth had already held two meetings in support of the measure, and that an agitation was at the present time going on in favour of making it a party question. The resolutions passed at the Exmouth meeting were also read and submitted to the approval of the meeting.

The CHAIRMAN said they could not do better than adopt the resolutions passed by so many distinguished Anglo-Indians who constituted a part of the meeting at Exmouth. He confessed that, not being himself an Anglo-Indian, he was unable to speak with authority on the subject, but as one whose family had been for a long time connected with India, he was deeply interested in the welfare of that country, and had come to the meeting prepared to listen with deep interest to the views of others who were qualified to speak with the authority which he lacked. After reading an extract from the June number of the National Review, which appeared to him to be an admirable epitome of the arguments to be advanced against the adoption of the Ilbert Bill, the chairman went on to speak of the disadvantages of the Bill as far as the women of India were concerned, referring to a very strong protest, which he had recently read, from a number of Anglo-Indian ladies on the subject, and in conclusion, quoted from the opinion of the Judges of the High Court of Calcutta in condemnation of the measure.

Colonel TICKELL (Teignmouth) proposed the first resolution—"That the members of this Association protest in the strongest manner against Lord Ripon's policy in India, as set forth in the Ilbert Bill, which they regard as injurious and offensive to the Anglo-Indian community, as well as perilous to the best interests of the Empire." The first and grand principle which animated those who were opposed to Mr. Ilbert's measure, he said, was that its introduction was subversive of the first principle of English jurisprudence, namely, that every man was entitled to be tried by his peers. (Hear, hear.) Hitherto the European magistrates in India had possessed no jurisdiction, except in the Presidencies of Calcutta and Bombay, where one or two men held jurisdiction under the supreme jurisdiction of the higher Courts. But the consequence of the proposal to extend that system beyond the presidencies would, if carried out, be that in those immense districts where indigo and tea and other manufactures were being brought to perfection, all the operatives who were for the most part Europeans would be at the mercy of a native magistrate for whom they could have no possible respect. The power of the native magistrate would be such that on the slightest information he might summon a European to his Court, try him summarily with native evidence—which those acquainted with the natives of India knew was not in any degree reliable—and commit him possibly at once. Appeal might of course be made, but that would not avert for the time being the inconvenience and injustice, probably, of whatever punishment might be inflicted. (Hear, hear.) Such a state of things would paralyse trade and cause immense confusion. (Hear, hear.) Then again, as railroads were springing up all over the country, the men engaged upon them would be similarly placed. With regard to what the chairman had referred to as the ladies' grievance, that was a far more serious matter than appeared on the surface. The petty spite at present existing would find vent. Petty charges would be made, and women would be summoned from their homes in the absence of their husbands to answer in some cases unfounded charges. This was no sentimental grievance, but possessed so much reality that men far and wide contemplated removing their families from the country in the event of the bill having been adopted when at first threatened. He was very much afraid that it would be impossible to prevail against the Government, who were backed by a strong majority, and could do practically as they pleased. They would doubtless be called obstructionists, but it was their duty, notwithstanding, to stand in the breach and do all that was possible to prevent the measure from ultimately becoming law. (Hear, hear.) Referring to the mission of Mr. Lalmohun Ghose, the native Indian barrister, and an able, educated man, who had been sent to stump the country, his great argument, he said, was that though his countrymen were not trusted with power they were powerful, and ought to be trusted. But who were his countrymen? The Bengali and the Baboos constituted only a small number of the people of India, and although known to be eloquent and clever, they were very unprincipled—men whom Macaulay stigmatised as a nation of fraud. And these were the men to whom it was proposed to give criminal jurisdiction. They were men who had been despised in all ages, and would be despised and hated still. No matter how a Radical Government pushed them forward, they would continue to be a contemptible race. (Applause.)

Captain WILKINSON, as one of the latest arrivals from India, though not prepared to say much on the subject, was well qualified to speak of the general feeling which existed in Bombay and Bengal in regard to this measure. The judges in Calcutta were very strongly opposed to the Bill. He had heard them speak against it, and with regard to the Press, there was only one paper that could be found to speak in favour of it, and that was a journal owned by a Native, and the editor of which was an Englishman. The English Government seemed to be making a party question of it, but he denied that it possessed any of the elements of a party question. Why was it forced upon the country? No one had asked for it. He had consulted several educated and influential natives, all of whom declared that they were not prepared for it. Who then was responsible for the present outcry? The whole number of men that it could affect was half a dozen, only two of whom would be really eligible to take the position the Government appeared anxious to give them. (Hear, hear.) He was glad to be in a position to state that not more than two or three of Lord Ripon's Council supported him in this matter. The effect of the bill, if adopted, would be, as had already been pointed out, to drive trade entirely out of the country. For who, he asked, under the circumstances would care to take charge of an indigo factory or a tea estate some hundreds of miles beyond the jurisdiction of the Calcutta Courts. (Hear, hear.) Illustrating the danger of such a course, Captain Wilkinson cited two instances in which the owner of a tea estate and a sugar factory respectively were charged with murder without the slightest prima facie evidence to substantiate such a charge. The natives in each case were afraid of losing their trade, and took this course to get rid of the gentlemen in question, who had recently come to settle amongst them. In each case the person so charged established his innocence, but in that of the sugar factor not before he had expended some 15,000 rupees. Had the Ilbert Bill become law, the probability is that, innocent as he was, he would have been hung. With regard to the case of women, natives as a rule had poor respect for them, and in the event of a woman being brought, in the absence of her husband, before a native chairman strongly imbued with this prejudice, the chances were that he would gloat over the opportunity afforded him of convicting on the strength of native evidence. The result of such a state of things would eventually be that traders would not stay in the country. The Government would be guilty of breaking faith with them, and general bankruptcy would ensue. Anglo-Indians, therefore, were very justly opposed to a measure capable of so much mischief. (Applause.)

The resolution was carried nem. con.

Colonel ORD proposed the next resolution, "That in the event of the Conservative Associations being in favour of convening a meeting at Victoria Hall, Exeter, to protest against the measure called the Ilbert Bill, a strong contingent from Teignmouth be invited to attend and support the executive of the Exmouth and East Budleigh District Conservative Association." As the mover of that resolution, he begged to be permitted to record his humble protest against the Indian Criminal Procedure Bill in the belief that that measure, if not strongly opposed, might actually become law before the mass of the English people clearly understood the effect of it on our hold of the Indian Empire. Did Lord Ripon and the present Government, he asked, ignore the highest opinion that could be obtained as to the merits of this Bill? He did not propose to read the 37 clauses which constituted the protest of the Calcutta judges, but would read clauses 32 and 33, which proved that the judges of India could hardly be considered to favour the measure when they used those ominous words in clause 33—"the judges feel bound to express their strong disapproval of the Bill." He (Colonel Ord) hoped the Exeter and Newton Abbot Associations would support Exmouth in the gathering which it was proposed to hold in the city of Exeter against Mr. Ilbert's Bill. (Applause.) Clauses 32 and 33 are as follows:—

"32. Lastly, the Judges have to consider the question of the finality of the Bill. They are, of course, perfectly satisfied that any assurances which may be given by the present Government or any members of it in that respect will be fully and faithfully adhered to. But such assurances would not be binding upon any future Government, and still less upon the native community. There would seem to be no elements of finality either in the Bill itself or in its subject matter. There is no reason why those in deference to whose wishes the Bill has been introduced should accept it otherwise than as a prelude to still larger concessions; and it may probably be more difficult in the future for Europeans to protect their rights when the principle upon which those rights depend has once been invaded."

"33. The Judges have endeavoured in the preceding remarks to explain why they consider the grounds for the introduction of the Bill to be insufficient. They believe that they have shown that it is justified by no necessity, either immediately present or sufficiently near at hand to require consideration; that the native civilians who enter the service by competition are a small and dwindling class; that nothing is as yet, or can be for many years, known of the officers appointed under 33 Vict. c. 3, except that they have not had the residence in England which is supposed by some to render the covenanted civilians competent to exercise the proposed jurisdiction; that the circumstance of Mofussil life render the present privileges of Europeans in the Criminal Courts not a mere sentimental gratification, but an important safeguard against a real danger; that the measure cannot be defended as contributing to the more effectual and impartial administration of justice—an object which the present law sufficiently attains, and which it is not pretended that the amended law would attain any better; that in this respect the present Bill differs from former measures of a like nature, which had for their object the removal of an acknowledged grievance; that the anomaly involved in the present state of the law is merely one instance of a state of things on which the entire structure of Indian society depends; that the right which the proposed legislation will take away ought not to be, and in fact is not generally regarded as invidious or oppressive, and, finally, that the Bill does not possess the elements of finality claimed for it, but on the contrary, must, whatever be the wishes of the Government, be hereafter made the standing ground from which further innovations will be demanded. On these grounds the Judges feel bound to express their strong disapproval of the Bill."

Colonel BROUGHTON formally seconded the resolution, which was unanimously adopted.

Rev. DONALD M. OWEN (Ideford) said he happened to be very nearly connected by ties of blood with the promoter of this unfortunate Bill, and he therefore felt considerable diffidence in showing any open hostility to the measure. He could only hope, however, as a strong and determined Conservative, from a party point of view, that this would be taken up by the leaders of the Conservative cause. (Hear, hear.) He contended that the Conservative party had not been the first to break through a wise and precious tradition of the House of Commons by making an imperial question a subject of party quarrel. (Hear, hear.) They were but following a very bad example set them for strictly party purposes, and, as a matter of fact, were simply, acting on the defensive. (Hear, hear.) He hoped that eventually India might be left to settle a question which pre-eminently interested herself, and that men who were entitled to speak with authority on the subject would not be silenced in India by the fear of bringing down upon themselves official disavowal. (Hear, hear.)

Captain WILKINSON stated that Mr. Ilbert practically knew nothing of the Bill until it was put into his hands, and he was urged to bring it forward. He hesitated, in the belief that it would not be received with favour, but was misled by the assurances of his colleagues that it would be generally accepted.

Sir JAMES ALEXANDER, K.C.B. (Teignmouth), remarked that as an old officer in India in command of native troops, he knew something of the feelings and habits of the natives, and in his judgment it would be a very unwise and even dangerous step to give them power over Europeans. (Hear, hear.) Every one knew of the terrible things which happened in the great Indian mutiny, and in his opinion it would be dangerous to arouse the animosities which were then excited, and which he believed the Ilbert Bill was calculated to provoke. He urged upon the Governor to apply in this matter the wisdom which prompted Lord Palmerston to decide that when a measure was doubtful it was best to leave it alone. (Hear, hear.) At least this measure was doubtful and was calculated to open the door to many abuses. He hoped, therefore, it would receive a strong opposition from the Conservative party, and that even unity, in railway parlance, it would be "shunted" altogether. (Applause.)

Mr. IMBERT-TERRY, as vice-chairman of the Exmouth and East Budleigh Conservative association, referring to the new Corrupt Practices Bill which had just become law, said that it was to such associations as those that in future the party would have to look for information. It was the duty of such associations to stand shoulder to shoulder in support of Imperial and party interests, and he was only happy to think that they had such an excellent object before them in regard to which they might coalesce and work together. (Hear, hear.)

The proceedings concluded with a cordial vote of thanks to the Chairman.

THE "MANCHESTER COURIER" ON MR. BRIGHT AND THE ILBERT BILL.

MR. BRIGHT has been interviewed and has dropped, like the lady in the Arabian tale, pearls of wisdom every time that he opened his lips. It appears that he is of opinion that "there is no one fit to govern India, except perhaps Gladstone;" that it is desirable to abolish the office of Governor General; that it would be well to rely more implicitly upon provincial governors partly because the Governor General being confined to Bengal does not see enough of the country, whilst "in the case of an ambitious man like Lord Dalhousie, or an incompetent man like Lord Lytton, the whole country is precipitated into complications and hostilities which men with smaller jurisdiction would not incur." There is something delightful in this way of putting down great men. Lord Dalhousie did good work in his time, though he was the champion of a policy which the much abused advocates of Imperialism have long abandoned, and Lord Lytton contrived amidst enormous difficulties to establish the Empire on a basis which, had his policy been followed out, would have lasted for many generations. It suited the Liberal faction to break down that policy, and as a result Mr. Bright thinks himself entitled to describe the most popular Governor-General of India with the one exception of Lord Mayo, as "incompetent." What follows is even more exquisite in its way. According to the report of the interviewer, Mr. Bright would break up the present Government of India into smaller Satrapies, with direct relations to the Home Government, and each having a provincial army and powers over taxation and revenue. Mr. Bright foreseeing that in the course of time, near or remote, England will have to leave India to herself, expresses an inclination to believe that it will be rather because the situation in Europe will compel that course than that the natives of India will enforce it. For the rest Mr. Bright pins his faith to the Marquis of Ripon, whom he has known "ever since he was a child," and is quite convinced that the most hon. marquis will do everything that is wise, and kind, and right for the nations over which he is called upon to rule. It is somewhat interesting as a commentary on the report of this interview to find that one of the oldest and most experienced of the Indian Civil servants has addressed to Mr. Bright a letter in which he effectually demonstrates that the ex-President of the Board of Trade is wholly ignorant of the needs and character of the people of India and that his recent action in supporting the Ilbert Bill, and talking the usual Radical talk about our greatest dependency is a mistake of the gravest kind.

The writer of the letter in question is Mr. C. Forjett, whose name, familiar enough in the days of the Indian Mutiny, has long passed out of the memories of the average stay-at-home Englishman. In that unhappy time Mr. Forjett fulfilled the office of Commissioner of Police in Bombay. Fifty years of his life, as he tells us, have been spent in India, thirty-five of which were given to the Civil Service seventeen of which were passed in such a way that during the whole of that period the English language was practically of no service to him. It may be remarked at this point, by the way, that the Indian Civil Service includes a great number of English gentlemen who have, like Mr. Forjett, given their whole lives to the service of their country, and who have willingly and for the most patriotic motives foregone all the advantages and all the luxuries of civilisation in order to keep up the prestige of their country and help most effectually in the work of government. Their opinions, however, are set aside by Mr. Bright and the modern school of a priori reasoners. They may know the people intimately; they may speak their languages with native fluency; they may from their official positions have had every opportunity of seeing the native character on all sides and of forming a sound and practical judgment upon it, but in the eyes of the Radical of the type which Lord Ripon so accurately represents all these advantages are nothing. The opinions of the official class must necessarily, they imagine, be biased, and that always in a direction inimical to the native races. With those races the only proper way of dealing is to set up an ideal Hindoo who shall be the incarnation of all the cardinal virtues and a few more in addition; who shall be truthful, honest, upright, sober, and patient, and who shall in addition be quite capable of appreciating all the efforts of the English officials to deal justly and honestly with him. The result is seen in this miraculous Ilbert Bill, which at the present moment stands condemned by everybody in India who has a right to offer an opinion on the subject, and which, as a matter of fact, is really supported by no one save its author and the crochety Radical Ultramontane peer with whom Mr. Gladstone has been pleased to afflict India. Mr. Forjett is one of those who condemn the Bill most strongly and in view of his position in India for so many years it must be admitted that his condemnation has very considerable force. A public servant who, according to so unimpeachable an authority as Colonel Malleon, "saved Bombay" during the Mutiny, and who upon his retirement from the service received testimonials from the civilian European and native populations of the Presidency of a pecuniary value not far short of £20,000, is likely to be a person with a right to speak on such a subject as the proposal to entrust native magistrates with rights over the European population. And Mr. Forjett does so speak in a letter to Mr. Bright, too long for quotation, but full of interest. His utterances are certainly much to the purpose. There is no appeal to "first principles," but he goes at once to the root of the matter. He tells Mr. Bright that "India is an arena, prolific of forgery, subornation, and counterfeited charges;" that to bribe, to lie, and to suborn are considered by no means wrong or immoral; that "he who can benefit himself by bribes is looked upon as being a 'lucky man,' while he who is not clever enough to steer clear of discovery is denounced as being a 'fool.'" In view of that state of things he considers the Ilbert Bill "a great mistake," and he predicts that "its operations, attaining to the proportions it must in time will place the life, liberty, and safety of Europeans all over India in jeopardy." Of Mr. Bright's sentimental objections to the maintenance of caste distinction as a moral wrong, Mr. Forjett is not unreasonably contemptuous. "What is it," he asks, "that enables a handful of Europeans to hold in subjection the millions in India? It is that precious abstraction which we call British prestige. Do away with it and we might as well drum ourselves out of the country." Against that prestige the Ilbert Bill, if by any unhappy chance it should pass into law, would deal the heaviest blow it has yet received, and consequently against the sentimentalism which would force it on Mr. Forjett enters a strenuous protest. Mr. Bright has protested that if the bill be not conceded there will be a growing discontent, and with the discontent a growing disloyalty. Mr. Bright has asked his audience at Birmingham how they would like to face that disloyalty; Mr. Forjett urges him to let the sentimentalism which has prompted the present agitation subside, and leave matters as they were. The result, he predicts, will be safety for the Empire and peace for the native populations, neither of which can be looked for if the present agitation is allowed to continue.

The closing paragraphs of Mr. Forjett's letter are worthy of all attention. He points out how sentimentalism on the Bengal side led to the promotion of the Indian Sepoy by seniority instead of by merit; how to the same cause were attributable the inordinate eulogies of the valour of those troops, and how, instead of those steps promoting his loyalty, they led the Sepoy to ignoring his European officer, and to believe that man for man he was quite as good as any European. This sort of thing it was, Mr. Forjett contends, which amongst others brought on the Indian Mutiny. The mutineers were then taught a necessary and most salutary lesson and the danger is over unless there is a repetition of the causes which led to that outbreak. Such a repetition is to be feared if the sentimental policy is continued; and "if," says Mr. Forjett, the present policy of implicit confidence in Russian good faith is continued it will not be many years before that danger presents itself. And then," he adds, "tall talk and loyal professions notwithstanding, neither Bengalee Baboo, nor any other of the classes of India would raise a finger to help us, and a single check on the frontier would disorganise our Sepoy army, render it worthless and dangerous, and demoralise the whole of India." There can be no doubt in the minds of men who have taken the trouble to recall the history of the past and to compare it with that history which is making itself from day to day, that these warnings are imperatively needed, and that if there should unhappily be another Indian Mutiny, or if the threatened Russian advance should come in the course of a comparatively short time, as the prophets of evil emphatically predict, the course of events will run pretty exactly in the lines traced out by Mr. Forjett and the opponents of the Ilbert Bill generally. The only question is whether it is worth while to address these remonstrances and these predictions either to Mr. Bright or to members of the present Government. Mr. Bright, as all the world knows, never made a mistake in his life, and is the one and only infallible pontiff of English politics. He has taken Mr. Ilbert and the sentimentalists under his protection—therefore they must be right and all the rest of the world wrong. As for the rest of the Cabinet, their cue, as we know, is to say "ditto to Mr. Gladstone," and as he supports Lord Ripon with blind devotion, and is perfectly convinced of the good faith and good intentions of Russia, is it to be feared that remonstrance to their address will be unavailing. When a man or body of men in the position of Mr. Bright and his former colleagues are possessed of the idea that India will sooner or later have to be given up, it is hardly likely that they will care to sanction any active steps for the preservation of our Empire in that continent.—Manchester Courier.

LORD HARTINGTON'S ACCURACY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIMES.

SIR,—One of the allegations constantly made by members of the present Government and by other supporters of the Ilbert Bill is that the opponents of that measure are actuated by views and motives adverse to the policy of advancing the natives of India in the public service, which for many years past has been inculcated by successive Governments in this country, and has been advocated from time to time by eminent Indian officials. This allegation is advanced in defiance of assertions to a contrary effect, which have been repeatedly made by some of the most prominent opponents of the Bill, and in the face of facts which are, or ought to be, known to the members of the Government in this country. The spirit of this allegation pervades the remarks made by Mr. Gladstone on the subjects of the Ilbert Bill on Tuesday last; but it is more definitely embodied in Lord Hartington's speech on Friday, in which he imputes unworthy motives to the opponents of the Bill, and, disregarding Lord Mansfield's advice to the untrained Judge, adduces reasons in support of his contention.

I wish to draw attention to two of the grounds upon which Lord Hartington imputes to those who are opposing this Bill a general opposition to the policy "of obtaining the assistance of the native population in the government of their country." The first of these is the alleged antagonism of the opponents of the Bill to a resolution passed in 1879, "which limited appointments of the value of 200 rupees a month to officers of the Army and natives." The terms of the resolution are not quite correctly described by Lord Hartington, but the description is sufficiently correct for my present purpose. The object of the resolution was to prevent the appointment of young English gentlemen, who, having failed to pass the examinations requisite for admission into the Covenanted Civil Service or into the Indian Staff Corps sought, and frequently obtained, employment in subordinate offices for which there were plenty of well-qualified natives available. The orders on the subject were contained in a despatch issued by the Secretary of State for India in 1879 at the instance of the Government of India, and the despatch of the Government of India was based upon a brief note written by the member of the Council then in charge of the Home Department, and of which I happen to have a copy in my possession. In this note the member of Council, after expressing his approval of a draft circular which had been framed under his instructions for the guidance of the Lieutenant Governors and Chief Commissioners of Provinces, submitted the following suggestion for the consideration of the Governor-General:—

"But there should be an analogous check upon the Governments of Madras and Bombay, and, therefore, I would now forward the proposed circular to the Secretary of State, and suggest that the Governments of Madras and Bombay should be prohibited from making such appointments without the previous sanction of the Secretary of State for India, which should be applied for through the Government of India."

The member of Council who thus suggested the issue of the orders to which Lord Hartington refers as having provoked the resentment of the opponents of the Ilbert Bill, is the writer of this letter.

The second specific fact to which Lord Hartington refers in support of his argument is connected with an order issued from the India Office when he filled the post of Secretary of State for India, confining admission to the Engineering College at Roorkee to persons of pure native extraction. Lord Hartington states that this order has evoked opposition in India, obviously implying that the opposition has emanated from Englishmen; but here again the inference which he seeks to establish is altogether inconsistent with the facts of the case. The opposition to the order has been almost entirely confined to Eurasians, who, though natives of India and expressly defined as such in the Act of Parliament of 1870, have been excluded by the terms of the order in question from admission to the Roorkee College, and therefore, to a great extent, from an employment in which many men of this class have done good service in the past, and for which, in common with persons of pure native extraction, they have just claims. The injustice and impolicy of such an order in its application to Eurasians, its inconsistency with the provisions of the Act of Parliament which contains the most recent exposition of the views of the British Legislature on the question of the employment of natives in India, and with the measures which are now being taken to provide better means of educating the very class which is now excluded from one of the employments hitherto open to it, and the embarrassment which the order has already caused to Lord Hartington's successor at the India Office, are facts which might have deterred the late Secretary of State for India from importing this question into the present discussion; but the incident shows the straits to which the official supporters of Lord Ripon's measure are reduced when, relying upon a powerful majority in Parliament and upon the ignorance of the public, they resort to arguments and representations of this nature.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

ALEXR. J. ARBUTHNOT.

THE "INDIAN MIRROR" ON THE BENGAL RENT BILL—FURTHER REASONS FOR ITS POSTPONEMENT.

HAVING discussed the Native Jurisdiction Bill thread bare, we now turn, once more, to a consideration of the Rent Bill, which it is proposed to pass into law during the same session of the Viceroy's Legislative Council. Doubtless, it is the intention and object of the Government to rectify the mistakes in the existing land-law, to adjust the conflicting interests and reconcile the strained relations between the landlord and tenant, and to contribute to the more equal distribution of wealth among the people. But the question is—Does the Rent Bill, in its present shape, serve these great ends, which are so desirable? The welfare of the agricultural classes, who are estimated to represent 80 per cent. of the 66 millions of the total population of Bengal, must always be allowed to preponderate over the interests of the comparatively small body who own a proprietary right in the soil; and that is exactly the very reason why the Bill should not be hurried through the Council.

The Rent Commission, whose report and Draft Bill are before us, was composed of some official members who, with every deference to them, we must say, can hardly be complimented with the possession of such experience in revenue affairs as qualified them to deal adequately with the final settlement of the many complicated questions in the law of landlord and tenant. Of course, these gentlemen—we refer only to the civilian members—have held office as collectors of districts; but we have not heard that even one man among them had made the practical administration of the revenue law a speciality. The present system of over-centralisation is, perhaps, responsible for depriving them of the necessary facilities for mastering the intricacies of our land system, and it is no injustice to them to say that they are all, almost without exception, mere theorists, who have derived their whole knowledge of the existing relations between landlord and tenant in the Courts, and not from local or personal observation and experience. Mr. Mackenzie, Mr. O'Kinealy, and Mr. Field, cannot be said to be such old officers as made the land-law of Bengal their special study. And they were the leading members of the Commission.

Then the Viceroy's present Council consists of members, of whom not one single gentleman can be considered to be an expert on this question. It is true that Sir Stuart Bayley has passed the best part of his term of service in Bengal; but he has been mostly employed in the Secretariats, and during the time he filled the office of Commissioner of the Patna Division, he could hardly have acquired more than a theoretical knowledge of the land system. The Honourable Messrs. Gibbs and Hope previously served in the Bombay Presidency, where the land tenures are altogether different, and their experience of Bengal, therefore, cannot count for more than the information which Major Baring, Mr. Ilbert, and General Wilson can bring to the Council from their researches from books and records. More cannot be said in favour of the official members. The non-official members, principally, if not wholly, represent the land-holding interest. To make up for this notorious deficiency of intimate familiarity with the details of revenue administration, Mr. Reynolds has been asked to go to Simla to assist the Council in the consideration of the provisions of the Bill. We are willing to give him full credit for his general abilities and for the versatility of his talents; but his comparatively short experience as a collector in Mysore hardly qualifies him to be accepted or recognised as a perfectly competent authority on questions concerning our present land-system.

The proposed law involves the most important and vital practical issues which have even come up for consideration and decision before any Government and Legislature in India. And yet these practical issues of immense moment to the progress of the country and the prosperity of the people are to be decided by a Council, in which not a single official member has ever been credited with having achieved the slightest distinction in the administration of the land revenue in Bengal.

If the Government has, after eighty years, been awakened to a sense of its obligation to do justice to the ryots, it seems to us that it might just as well take such time as would enable it to render full justice to them, without being quite unfair or unreasonable to the Zemindars. We are not sure that in the hurried way in which the Bill is proposed to be passed, it may not do serious harm to the ryots.

Doubtless, mass-education and the creation of a quasi-peasant proprietorship are measures which are quite in accord with the principles of advanced Liberalism, and are, certainly indications of large-hearted benevolence on the part of the Government. But must confess to some surprise that, while a Commission was sent about every Presidency and Province of the Empire to ascertain the wishes of the people through representative bodies and gentlemen in regard to a national system of education, no similar course was taken to make the Government thoroughly acquainted with the feelings and wishes of the two most important classes, whose respective rights and interest on the tenderest point of their nature, were proposed to be finally settled in the Bengal Rent Bill.

Again, in respect to the Ilbert Bill, which affects only a few Native members of the Covenanted Civil Service, but which has kindled the wrath of almost the whole European community into a white heat, the Government saw fit to call twice for reports from the Local Governments and Administrations. But in regard to the Rent Bill, which is to deal for all time to come with the rights and interests of 80 per cent. of the total population of Bengal, a Commission sat and settled the principles of the proposed legislation by deliberation, and without taking the evidence of the leading men of both classes in every district, as was done in the case of the new system of education.

The Zemindars are able enough to make their voices heard either individually, or through their representative associations, or the members who are to maintain their cause in the Viceroy's Legislative Council. It is true that the official members of the Council are supposed, from their position, to hold briefs for the ryots; but it is not difficult to understand what is likely to be the result of their advocacy, when they will be groping in the dark as to the actual merits of their client's case.

Whether the proposed law, as it stands, does or does not injure the Zemindars, it certainly will not be quite satisfactory to the ryots. The consequence will be that, while a White Mutiny is raging over the Jurisdiction Bill, the Government, by hurried and perfunctory legislation on such an important question as that of rent, may be recklessly provoking a Black Mutiny.

To us it seems absolutely necessary, for securing a thoroughly complete and efficient code of land-law for Bengal, that the present Rent Bill should be deferred till a fresh Commission shall have been formed to visit every district in Bengal, to take the evidence of the leading Zemindars and representative ryots on its provisions, and to ascertain their views as to how the defects of the present system can be most effectually rectified. In such a case the Legislature would be able to proceed on a solid basis and to turn out a law which would be creditable to itself and beneficial to the country. At all events an expression of opinion from both Zemindars and ryots on the principles and details of the Bill is urgently needed.

Precipitate legislation on the rent question, at a season when so many elements of trouble are busily at work, will bring discredit on Lord Ripon's Government; and our sense of gratitude to that Government for the many beneficent measures it has passed and is about to pass, impels us to ask it to pause before it proceeds with a law which, we are convinced, is most inopportune just now, and may be fraught with consequences it may not be easy to foresee—still less to guard against—in the present state of public feeling in Bengal.

SERIOUS DRAUGHT IN NORTHERN INDIA.—Very depressing telegrams are being received from many districts by the Government regarding the state of the crops in Northern India. An actual famine is not anticipated, but great scarcity is threatened. The reports from many districts state that the crops are half ruined, and unless rain falls within a few days, entire ruin must ensue.

A large portion of the country, embracing the Punjab, North-West Provinces, Behar, the Central Provinces, Central India, Rajputana, and Sind, is suffering from want of rain. In the Bombay Presidency also more rain is generally required. Bengal and parts of Madras have been getting rain, while the west of India has been for some weeks unusually dry.

In Ceylon, too, they are complaining of insufficient rain.

The locust continue to be the chief danger which threatens the crops in the Bombay Presidency, but more rain would now be generally welcome, and in some parts of the Southern Mahratta Country and in Sind it is urgently required.

The chief officer and fifteen men were drowned when the vessel was wrecked. The others were robbed by a tribe of Arabs and passed through severe sufferings before they found an asylum at an Arab village in the interior.

Some anxiety had been felt regarding the safety of the Amberwitch on account of her long absence, and the survey steamer Investigator had been ordered to proceed from Bombay in search of her.

THE CRIMINAL JURISDICTION BILL.

CALCUTTA, AUG. 13.—A general meeting of the European and Anglo-Indian Association was held on Saturday evening in the Town Hall. Some 200 persons were present, and Mr. Keswick, president of the Association, was in the chair. After the formal business had been transacted, the President made a short statement, mentioning that the total amount of subscriptions received to date was Rs. 1,42,014, and the number of subscribers, resident, non resident, associate and foreign, 7,510. One lakh of rupees had been invested in four per cent. Government Paper. The number of resident members was 202, non-resident 352, associate 142, foreign 24, showing a monthly income of Rs. 1,012 from subscriptions. He also gave the number of signatures to the memorials, which were as follows:—House of Commons memorial, 14,989; House of Lords, 13,139; Viceroy, 11,783; and Secretary of State, 12,254. The signatures to the ladies' petition to the Queen numbered 5,800.

The President then said:—The European and Anglo-Indian public have been quiet of late, waiting for Government to redeem its promise of giving the views of the local Governments and the public the fullest weight and the most deliberate consideration; but there is reason to fear that the Government mistakes quietness for indifference and thinks it can safely pass this obnoxious measure without encountering any serious opposition. It is not right that Government should deceive itself in this way. It is said that the Government have decided to publish the opinions received from the local Governments on the subject of the Native Jurisdiction Bill in a collated form, but the remembrance that the debate of the 9th March was not only collated, but manipulated, shakes confidence, and the public desires to see the opinions in their integrity unabridged and uncollated. I have seen at stated that it is no use attempting to resist the bill, as the Government have determined to pass it; but it is our duty to show the objections to it to the last, and then if the Government will err and deliberately alienate Europeans and Anglo-Indians throughout the country, it will do so with its eyes open. It must not think all trouble will end by passing the bill. The application of it will be a thousand times more disastrous. Look at the spectacle before us. Government are trying to force upon us a most obnoxious bill out of no necessity, but because they cannot afford to be beaten. It must do injustice, that the power may remain plain. It must rob us of our birthright, lest our native fellow-subjects mistake its justice for weakness. I believe that all the advisers of the Viceroy have informed him that there is no necessity for the change he proposes, and that no Judges will be as satisfactory for Europeans as European Judges. We are accused of want of sympathy with our native fellow-subjects most unjustly. We do not desire to take away any of their rights, but only to defend our own. We have no wish to see them done out of any honours; only do not let them be judges over us in the Mofussil Criminal Courts. All who are acquainted with civil Courts in the mofussil, presided over by natives, know how reasonable we are in asking for this, and our reasonableness must be patent to most Zemindars who know how these Courts are conducted. The Government do not intend to permit native judges to have jurisdiction over European soldiers in cantonments. The Commander-in-Chief was alarmed when he heard that cantonment magistrates might be subject to the orders of Native superiors. He wanted native judges to experiment on civilians only, and I recently noticed an order that native Sepoys are to be tried by Europeans only in future. Are our voices not to be heard because we have no voice in returning members to Parliament? The smallest constituency at home commands more attention from the Government of the day than the whole European population of India; but we must never be silent, and never sit down quietly under an injustice. The Viceroy of India has hitherto been invested with very exceptional powers, confided to no other subject of the Queen-Empress, expressly for the purpose of maintaining the supremacy of the British race in this country, where it is vastly out-numbered; and we consider the employment of those powers for the avowed purpose of transferring authority from European to native hands, without reference to the feelings and wishes of the Europeans affected by the transfer, is a most serious breach of public trust. (Loud cheers.)

Mr. A. B. Miller proposed the following resolution:—That it is imperative in the interests of the whole of the Indian community, Native as well as European, that this Association should continue to exert its utmost energies to effect the withdrawal of the Criminal Procedure Amendment Bill." The Association, he said, had adopted a pacific policy for some time, trusting in the promise of Government that they would abide by official and non-official opinion. It is true that when his Excellency the President in Council gave the pledge, he qualified it, but it was no qualification of a statesman. Mr. Miller said that when the bill was first introduced it was tried to be fathered on to Sir Ashley Eden, who, however, had emphatically repudiated the authorship. Then it was said that there was a consensus of opinion in its favour, and that it was needed to remove an anomaly, grave administration difficulties, and race disqualifications. In Mr. Miller's opinions, instead of it being an enabling, it was a disabling act instead of qualifying, it disqualified. When all the arguments in support of the bill had been thrashed out, the only sheet anchor of the Government was its administrative convenience; but this also Mr. Rivers Thompson had dispelled. The supporters of the bill could be numbered by one's fingers. Nearly the whole of the sixty-five thousand European troops, if they were allowed to give an opinion, would repudiate the measure. The entire opinion, both of the official and non-official community, was against it, and he thought they were right in calling upon the Government to carry out its pledge and to withdraw the bill.

Mr. Henry Bell, barrister-at-law, and Mr. J. G. Apear, barrister-at-law, seconded and supported the resolution, which was carried with enthusiasm.

The meeting throughout was very earnest, and the proceedings remarkable for temperate language and orderly behaviour.

INDIAN MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

(From the Bombay Gazette.)

His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief (Sir Donald Stewart) will probably leave Simla about Nov. 1, and will visit Banda, Nowgong, Sangor, and Pachmarhi before proceeding to Calcutta and Bangalore.

Major-General Sir H. T. Macpherson, commanding the Allahabad Division, and Lieutenant General Hughes, commanding the Sirhind Division, have been granted sixty days' privilege leave. Brigadier Generals Wilkinson (Presidency District) and Massy (Gwalior District) also proceed on thirty and forty-three days' privilege leave respectively.

General Sir H. Macpherson has returned to Allahabad after paying a flying visit to Segowlie and Calcutta.

Brigadier-General Wilkinson, commanding the (Calcutta) Presidency District, is about to proceed on privilege leave, Colonel Macnair, of the 4th Bengal Native Infantry, assuming officiating command of the troops during the General's absence.

Brigadier-General Sir O. V. Tanner, the Sind Gazette says, is now at Thull Chotiali, and returns to Quetta shortly via Giral and Camp New Cantonments. Sir R. Sandeman is at Ziarut.

Col. Van Heythuysen, Bombay Commissariat Department, has been granted an extension of his leave for six months.

Colonel Henry Hamor Stansfield, Bengal Infantry, Commandant Darjeeling and Northern Bengal State Railway Volunteer Rifle Corps, comes in for his colonel's allowances on the 23rd September, and will proceed to England. He served through the Indian Mutiny in 1857-58, and was present at the siege of Lucknow, operations in Oude, and in the Azimghur and Jugdespore districts, for which he received the medal with clasp.

Colonel Sam Madden, C.B., 1st Battalion King's Own Light Infantry (South Yorkshire Regiment), now at Bareilly, who has come under the age clause of the Royal Warrant of 1881, on July 5, was compulsorily retired, after serving his country for forty years, less one day. The cause of his forced retirement was his having reached the age of fifty-nine years. The retirement of Colonel Madden leaves a good service pension for disposal.

Colonel W. T. Baker, of the Suffolk Regiment, has retired with the honorary rank of major general. He has been granted full pay on retirement, having thirty-five years' service. In the same Gazette, the Pioneer remarks, Colonel R. J. Hughes, C.B., lately commanding the Presidency District, having succumbed to the age clause of the new warrant, has also been retired, and has been granted the same honorary rank of major general. "It would be amusing, perhaps, to hear General Hughes's opinions or remarks on the subject, for he is a plain-spoken man, and calls a spade a spade. His conduct at Ahmed Kheyl helped to prevent a disaster, and it seems hardly fair treatment that he should never be allowed to rise above an honorary major general with a little over £400 a year pension. Such treatment is not the way to make the British service popular."

Lieutenant Colonel R. F. Angelo, B.S.C., who has just retired from the service, held the command of the fort of Chunar from April, 1877, till last February, when he obtained leave of absence till August 10, and was succeeded by Colonel Malcolm Clerk. Colonel Angelo entered the service in January, 1855, when he joined the old 41st N.I. Colonel Angelo served during the Indian Mutiny, and was present at the actions of the Terai, Moradabad, and Bareilly.

Major P. H. Greig has been appointed station staff officer at Ahmednuggur, in succession to Major Fagan, whose tenure of the office expired on Aug. 5.

Sixty days' privilege leave of absence, from August 17th, is granted to Major E. Hay, 7th Bengal Cavalry.

Captain R. S. Riddell, paymaster 2nd Battalion East Surrey Regiment, intends proceeding on privilege leave for sixty days, Lieutenant R. D. Wynyard performing his duties during his absence.

The following officers will proceed home during the ensuing trooping season for duty at the depôts of their corps:—Captain Gallway, Somersetshire Light Infantry; Captain Harden, Bedfordshire; Lieutenant Brown, Royal Scots Fusiliers; Lieutenant Armitage, South Wales Borderers; Captain Tapp and Lieutenant Gompertz, Hampshire; and Lieutenant Guilding, Essex Regiment.

The 26th P.N.I., at Peshawur, has again changed its commanding officer, and now Major Fitzgerald officiates as commandant, it is believed, until the return of Colonel Chester in October. Lieutenant Colonel Wauchope, second in command, 14th Sikhs, has been commanding the 26th P.N.I. since Lieutenant Colonel Birch proceeded to join the 25th P.N.I., at Ferozepore, in April last. Colonel Wauchope has now proceeded to join his own corps, to take over the command from Colonel Williams, who has obtained furlough for seventy-two days' prior, it is believed, to retiring; consequently Colonel Wauchope will in due course obtain the permanent berth. The 26th P.N.I. has now one of its own officers in command, who joined it twenty-two years ago, and for the last five years or so has been away on staff employ at Multan and Quetta, from which he rejoined last month.

Lieutenants Henniker, King's Royal Rifle Corps, Raitt, Leinster, and Hamilton, South Yorkshire, have all been removed to the first battalions of their respective corps.

Lieutenant Lumsden has been appointed adjutant of the 3rd Bengal Cavalry.

Lieutenant Hedley Wright, of the 11th (Prince of Wales's Own) Bengal Lancers, has proceeded from Umballa to the Straits Settlements on three months' leave of absence.

Lieutenant Shakespear, 2nd Battalion Royal Irish Fusiliers, has been appointed to the 6th Infantry, Hyderabad Contingent, as a probationer for the Staff Corps.

A committee will assemble shortly at Cherat to lay out the ground for the future cantonments, and to define the boundaries. The services of Lieutenant E. H. Hemming, R.E., No. 8 Company, Sappers and Miners, have been temporarily placed at the disposal of the Superintending Engineer, Military Works, for duty in connection with the proposed new cart-road to Cherat.

Surgeon G. H. Young, A.M.D., doing duty at the Benares station, has been directed to proceed to Allahabad.

Surgeon A. Duncan, I.M.D., is transferred from Meean Meer to the officiating medical charge of the 15th Bengal Cavalry at Mooltan.

The proposal for creating an Inspector General of Indian Volunteers has not, it is stated, the least chance of obtaining the sanction of the Secretary of State.

The medal for the best shot among the Volunteers in the Madras Presidency, in the annual course of 1882-83, has been won by Captain Pratt, Bangalore Rifle Volunteers.

INDIAN DRAFTS.—It has been notified at Aldershot from the Horse Guards, by letter dated August 31, with reference to the Horse Guards memorandum issued for the guidance of commanding officers in preparing drafts for India, that in many cases lately the siege rolls and requisitions in duplicate for helmets have been forwarded to the India Office instead of to the Superintendent, India Store Department. Officers commanding regiments, battalions, batteries, and depôts are, in future, to take the necessary steps to see that these applications are properly addressed.

INCREASE OF SOBRIETY IN THE INDIAN ARMY.—By the last returns published it appears that a great decrease has taken place in the consumption of strong drinks by the European soldiers in India, and that there is a corresponding spread of sobriety among the rank and file of the army there. In the year 1877-78 the total consumption of rum among British troops in India was 253,354 gallons, whereas in 1881-82 it fell to 149,801 gallons. Comparing the same years as regards beer-drinking, the figures are, respectively, 76,942 and 74,747 hogsheads. Thus it will be seen that though the consumption of rum has decreased, that of beer has not increased.

MAHOMEDANS IN INDIA.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "TIMES."

SIR,—The present Government is, I believe, anxious to avoid disregarding native public opinion in India. There is at present much agitation among the Mahomedan community regarding the preservation entire of the dominions guaranteed to the Nizam by the British Government. There are upwards of forty millions of Mahomedans in India.

The Nizam is too young to undertake the government himself, and a Regency has been appointed, and has consented to mortgage the revenues of the State for the purpose of raising money for the construction of a railroad from Hyderabad to Chanda.

In a legal point of view it is doubtful whether a Regency nominated by us can pledge the credit of a native State; but the political question is of much greater importance. Is it worth our while to give our subjects ground for believing us guilty of an intention to appropriate the Provinces of Aurnagabad and Nuldroog? If we were to pledge our own credit instead of that of the young Nizam, we should be hailed as benefactors by the Mahomedans throughout India, instead of being stigmatised as covetous annexationists.—Your obedient servant,
ST. GEORGE TUCKER.

Woodside, Gervis-road, Bournemouth, Aug. 30.

INDIAN WHEAT.

VARIOUS circumstances have lately combined to make the subject of wheat cultivation in India a matter of interest beyond trade circles, and the papers now published by order of Parliament form an important and appropriate contribution on a question of the most vital consequence to the future of Indian commerce. The document comprises the report of Messrs. M'Dougall Brothers upon four lots of Indian wheat delivered to them by Messrs. Harris, brokers of the Secretary of State for India. The instructions given were that Messrs. M'Dougall should take a given quantity of the four representative Indian wheats—viz., Indian "fine soft wheat," "superior soft red," "average hard white," and "average hard red"—and manufacture them into flour by the ordinary process of grinding under millstones. Also that similar quantities should be manufactured into flour by means of crushing between rollers, according to what is known as the Hungarian or roller system. Further, that a given quantity of each flour should be manufactured into bread; that the qualities and other characteristics of the flours and offals thereof should be severally noted; that the Indian wheats should be severally compared with all the leading varieties of home and foreign wheats. The Parliamentary papers furnish full details of the elaborate and complete examination made under the personal supervision of one of the members of the firm of M'Dougall Brothers; but the technicalities would not interest the general reader. It will suffice to say that the conclusion of the inquiry is that there is no probability of these Indian wheats coming into demand for manufacture into flour without a liberal admixture of other wheats. They all possess, in a marked degree, the same characteristics of great dryness and a distinct beany and almost aromatic flavour, inseparable from wheats grown in the climates and soils of the tropics. Also, the flours are ricey, the texture of the bread is too close, and the crust is hard and brittle. But these characteristics do not detract from their usefulness in any important degree. As is well known, a miller cannot show skill in his craft to greater advantage or profit than in the way he selects his wheats and mixes his grists, so as to produce to best advantage a flour from which bread can be made of the colour, bloom, strength, and flavour desired, and withal a good yield. Messrs. M'Dougall pronounce the Indian wheats to be exceedingly useful wheats—in fact, hardly equalled for what is deficient in the English market by any other wheats. Their chief characteristics are just those in which wheats grown in our variable climate are most deficient. Their great dryness and soundness render them invaluable for admixture with English wheats that are in any degree out of condition through moisture; and the great proportions of the wheat harvested here have been in that condition for years past—a condition that must prevail in all other than that of wheats harvested and stored during fine and favourable weather. Added to their dryness, the thinness of the skins of these wheats, and the consequent greatness of the yield of flour, must always place them in the front rank as a "miller's" wheat, whenever they are handled with reasonable intelligence and skill. Such unprecedented yields of flour as shown by these wheats, ranging (by ordinary grinding) from 77·46 to 80·52 per cent., against English 65·2, and American spring 72·2, speak volumes in their favour; and their value is still further increased by another point of merit of almost equal importance—viz., a larger percentage of bread may be obtained than from any other of the flours included in the review. That for the best of these Indian wheats (the fine soft white) on the day they were valued on Mark-lane Market, a price was offered as high as that for American "winters," New Zealand, or English, proves that the great value of the Indian wheats is becoming recognised in this country. The beany flavour of the other three sorts is not a serious obstacle, as fair average deliveries, when well cleaned and properly dealt with, can be employed in the proportion of 25 per cent. or 50 per cent. along with home-grown or other wheats, such as Americans, possessing a fine, sweet, milky, or nutty flavour. Glancing at all the facts, Messrs. M'Dougall think it is evident that these wheats afford a larger margin of profit, both to the miller and the baker, than any other. They record the conviction long held, and strongly emphasised by the results of these experimental workings, of the measureless importance of the great resources of the Indian Empire being developed to the utmost in producing wheat for this country. Farmers here are finding that to live they must produce beef and mutton rather than grain; hence the greater need of resources of supply under our own control. It is evident such a conviction is common to the members of the Council of India, as testified by their increasing efforts in this direction; and Messrs. M'Dougall congratulate them on the important fruits arising from their labours. The character and general excellence of the Indian wheats are improving with the deliveries of each successive season. The Indian wheats specially under review were delivered in excellent condition, with freedom from dirt, barley, gram, and other impurities, also with a freedom from weevil rarely equalled by Indian wheats, except the prime parcels of the past season; and there is no doubt an outlet in this country and the European Continent for unlimited quantities, at prices that will prove remunerative to all parties concerned, either in their growth, transportation, or conversion into flour and bread.

MR. MORRISON ON THE BENGAL TENANCY BILL.

WE reproduce elsewhere a speech on the Bengal Tenancy Bill, delivered by Mr. Morrison at the Bhagalpur meeting of landholders, which will, we trust, attract the attention both of the Viceroy and of the Secretary of State. We have here presented to us, in language which is none the less forcible because of its playful tone of badinage, the common-sense view of the sickly sentimentalism that is now rampant in India, and that is sacrificing the peace and welfare of the Empire to the crotchets and fads of one or two well-meaning but unpractical and impracticable doctrinaires. Lord Ripon and Mr. Ilbert have unhappily carried with them to India an irrepressible zeal for the eternal verities of Radicalism. Fired by the notable results, in Ireland, of experiments that have there produced wholesale confiscation and anarchy in the name of land reform, they thirst for the glory of a similar revolution on a more magnificent scale; and the Conservative institutions of Bengal its peacefulness, its remarkable prosperity, and the comparatively defenceless condition of its propertied class, all seem to invite them to the vigorous exercise of their Radical functions as strife-makers and destroyers. Like Charles Lamb's Chinaman, who set fire to house after house in order to taste the toothsome flavour of roast pig, they pursue the search for Radical justification and sanctification through a series of political conflagrations, each more disastrous than its predecessor; and with the whole Empire ablaze around them through their folly, they seem to be able to think of nothing but fresh "anomalies" calling for fresh firebrand legislation.

Mr. Morrison looks back with very natural regret to the old peaceful times before the Radical invasion, when contracts were still held to be sacred things, and when rational beings were still held to be competent to make contracts. The words in which the Central Committee of Bengal and Behar landholders refer to this abrogation of a natural right of man, the right of free contract, are keenly satirical. The Zemindars say:—

Contract is the basis of transactions in civilised life, the first step in advance over patriarchal habits, and essential to the success of social and moral progress. The tenant, as an agriculturist or as a member of society, is allowed perfect freedom of contract in all matters affecting him, whatever the difference in the status, intelligence, and influence of the contracting parties; but this Bill declares that he shall not be competent to enter into a contract respecting his tenant-right or the rent payable by him, unless his contract for the latter is approved by a Revenue officer to be appointed by Government. This denial of the ordinary rights of a citizen to the tenant was never before known in this country. On the contrary, the Legislature, had repeatedly encouraged the interchange of lease between landlord and tenant. The disability imposed upon the landlord for the sake of the fancied security of the tenant is still more arbitrary, unjust, and unjustifiable.

Mr. Morrison well developed this sarcasm, by comparing the ways of John Company Bahadur—"Right Honourable in every sense of the term," the speaker said—With the tricks and the manners of more recent honourable, right honourable, and most honourable rulers. He then proceeded to show how one result of the Bill will be to degrade the tenant-farmers of Bengal to the position of day labourers; for the joldars will promptly alienate their jotes, as soon as they are permitted by law to do so, to provide for marriage tamashas and similar festivities, and thereafter sink from the condition of joldar to that of cooly. And lastly he dealt in a trenchant way with one of the worst features of this Bill, in the introduction of "compensation for disturbance of the tenant-at-will," into a country where such highly "advanced" notions are utterly unknown, and altogether at variance with all traditions and customs. He very properly ridiculed the idea of the tenant-at-will—whom Mr. Ilbert glorifies under the title of "the ordinary ryot"—putting such improvements into the land as to deserve the compensation which Lord Ripon's Bill so liberally allots to him out of the pockets of the Zemindars. These are only three points of objection, out of the large number that may justly be urged against this very one-sided and mischievous Bill; but we believe that no unprejudiced person of ordinary intelligence will read Mr. Morrison's speech without feeling that these three objections alone are amply sufficient to condemn the measure.

THE HINDOO PATRIOT ON THE OUTRAGES ON ENGLISHWOMEN IN CALCUTTA

THE attempt made by Sir George Campbell, in his place in Parliament, to throw doubt on the reality of the horrible scenes that have been occurring in Calcutta, compels us, with some reluctance, to publish in another column the report, so far as it is fit for publication, of the trial of Hurroo mehler on July 30 before Mr. Justice O'Kinealy and a common jury, for an atrocious outrage on the wife of the Public Prosecutor. As the wretched man has been sentenced to eight years' transportation, and the report of the trial is to be read in every Indian newspaper, probably Sir George Campbell may now think it fair to make some amende to those correspondents whose telegrams he impugned by his extraordinary statement in the Budget Debate, that he "utterly failed to substantiate them after diligent search in the Indian papers."

With regard to the second outrage, committed in the house of Mr. Justice Norris, we would earnestly commend to Sir George Campbell the example of one of his allies in supporting the Ilbert Bill, the Hindoo Patriot of Calcutta. The Patriot is naturally and probably anxious to minimise the importance of these shocking incidents; and ridicules the notion that the perpetrators of these atrocities "must be in the pay of a certain class of native agitators." It adopts the supposition—first started, we believe, by the Amrita Bazar Patrika—that some of the outrages may have been, not real occurrences, but imaginary ones, conjured up by the hysterical fears of English ladies under the influence of the prevailing panic.

This is what the Hindoo Patriot says :—

"On the 17th inst. the Englishman published the following :—'At about 3 a.m. on Friday last, a lady living as a guest with the family of a gentleman who fills one of the highest offices in the service of the State, and a proportionately conspicuous position in Calcutta society, and occupying a room on the ground-floor, was aroused from her sleep to find a strange native by her bedside, with his hand on her knee. On her screaming loudly for help, the scoundrel, who appears to have entered through an adjoining bath-room, beat a hasty retreat, and succeeded in making good his escape before assistance arrived. The police of the neighbouring station were promptly communicated with, but have been unable to obtain any clue to the identity of the trespasser.'"

"A feeling of deep indignation has been aroused, and is unquestionably prevalent, among Europeans in this city in connection with the recent case of attempted criminal assault on a young English lady, to which the Englishman is responsible for referring in its issue of the 17th instant. Endeavours—doomed from the first to keep the occurrence profoundly secret, have signally failed, and the matter is to-day such an open secret—names being freely mentioned—that I now venture to refer to it with some degree of candour. The occurrence took place early on the morning of Friday last ; in a room on the ground floor of a house a few hundred yards south from Park-street, in occupation at present by a Judge of the High Court, who unfortunately, but naturally, has become an object of great aversion and antipathy to Lord Macaulay's friends—the Bengalis—in connection with the recent committal of Surendra Nath Bannerji to the Presidency Gaol for contempt of the High Court. Ever since Surendra Nath Bannerji's committal the learned Judge, to whom I refer, has been constantly annoyed with anonymous letters couched in the most offensive language, and many of them containing dire threats of vengeance in re Bannerji against His Lordship, offering him the grossest insults, promising him an early death, and so on. One letter, received by His Lordship in the High Court the other morning, indicated to him that an early opportunity would be taken by its courageous Bengali writer and his allies of cutting up His Lordship into eighty pieces ! Not only have threats of personal injury been uttered against the judge I allude to, but he has been informed, I believe by letter, that outrages similar to that attempted upon the wife of the Public Prosecutor here some time ago would be committed on the ladies of his household, and the revelation of the foiled villany of last Friday morning seems to be that an attempt to carry out one of these cowardly and blackguard threats of insult combined with injury has now been made."

None can denounce these outrages more strongly than we do, but we again beseech the Englishman and his confrères not to spread the panic. Possibly our contemporary does not realise the mischief he is causing. We do not know whether the case under notice was the result of a false impression or actual occurrence. It is quite possible that when a panic spreads among ladies on the subject, dreams of this disturbing character may seize their minds. It is hard to conceive that any native would dare touch the person of a European lady at dead of night in a house well guarded and occupied by no less a personage than a judge of the High Court. It is nonsense to say that such a native must be in the pay of a certain class of native agitators. The whole thing is shrouded in mystery, inasmuch as the man's identity could not be discovered in darkness.

Now, in this contention of the Hindoo Patriot there is much that is perfectly reasonable. It is far more effective than a mere imputation on the veracity of reporters, such as that advanced by Sir George Campbell in the House of Commons, which can only impose on the public during the short period that must elapse before it is contradicted by facts. And, moreover, the contention is altogether a fair and honourable one, in no way depending for its force on base vilification of opponents, and we are entirely at one with our contemporary in deprecating any exaggeration of a panic, which already threatens the most disastrous results to the relations between Englishmen and Indians in India. Still, it is unhappily a fact that the attendant circumstances—which were narrated in the private letter published by us last week—render it impossible to believe that the outrage in Mr. Justice Norris's house could by any possibility have been the creation of hysterical imagination. Following immediately on the horrors of Mrs. Hume's case, about which not even Sir George Campbell will venture now to suggest any doubts, it seems to us impossible not to regard with deep concern the obvious probability—to say the least, and with every allowance for the undoubted fact put forward by the Patriot, that "the whole thing is shrouded in mystery"—that there is some real, some terrible connection between two crimes directed against the households of two officers, both closely associated with the events of the recent agitation. And at any rate, it seems a most deplorable thing that political considerations should be sufficient to induce a statesman in the position of the Secretary of State for India, to treat events of such dreadful possible significance in the way in which Lord Kimberley treated them, when he affected to misunderstand the meaning of Sir Alexander Arbuthnot's warning, and endeavoured to fix on the Anglo-Indian deputation the monstrous hypothesis that native magistrates would be likely to sympathise with such outrages.

EDUCATION IN THE PUNJAB.

Those of our Punjab readers who have done us the honour of following our occasional remarks on the recent progress of education in the Punjab, will have read with considerable astonishment an article that appeared in our last issue, purporting to be a review of the last Punjab Educational Report. That article was published in our columns under a misapprehension which we deeply regret—a misapprehension that was only rendered possible by the temporary absence of responsible editor of this journal, who never saw the article until after its publication. It not only advocates views of general educational policy which we believe to be altogether mischievous and erroneous ; but it also contains reflections on the official conduct of one of the most able, trustworthy, and efficient educational officers in India—the Director of Public Instruction in the Punjab—which are altogether unjustifiable, and seem to us to be inspired by dull, malignant spite. We can only now repeat our regret that such a discreditable effusion should have appeared in a journal, the traditions of which (whatever may be its other demerits) have never permitted any paltering with personal vulgarity.

MR. GLADSTONE AND THE ILBERT BILL.—The Secretary of the National Reform Union has received from Mr. Gladstone the following acknowledgment of the receipt of a copy of a resolution passed by the Executive Committee on the Ilbert Bill :—"10, Downing-street, Whitehall, 28th August, 1883. Sir,—Mr. Gladstone is obliged to you for having sent him the terms of the resolution which was adopted last week by the National Reform Union in regard to the policy of Lord Ripon in India ; and I am directed to convey to the members of the association Mr. Gladstone's thanks for having recorded their opinion on the subject. He is glad to observe that their views are in such entire accord with those of Her Majesty's Government, and it will afford him much pleasure to forward the resolution to the Secretary of State for India.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant, E. W. HAMILTON. Arthur G. Symonds, Esq."
